It is easy to perceive that in making this Treaty Henry had three different views. First, to prevent Charles VIII from becoming master of Bretagne, whilst the Dukes was so little able to resist him. If Charles should have finished the conquest of Bretagne next Campaign, as was very easy, Henry would have been blamed by all Europe. Particularly, he would have been inexcusable to the Parliament, who had granted him a very considerable subsidy for the defence of that Duchy. His second view was to frighten the King of France, by the sending of English Troops into a compliance to end the affair by way of Negotiation. This is manifest from his lending the six thousand Men for eight months only, and that too, when they were of no service but to prevent the Court of France from violating the Treaty of Argen then in force. His third and chief aim was, to secure the reimbursement of what he was going to advance, for the maintenance of the six thousand Men for eight months. He had already projected the keeping for his own use the subsidy granted by Parliament for the defence of Bretagne, in the expectation of deciding the affair by his mediation. Mean while, he saw that the young Prince, in her circumstances, could not resist the King of France, if he thought of pursuing his conquests. So, to oblige King Charles to enter into Treaty, it was necessary to show him the Dukes would not want Protectors, if he pretended to continue to use the way of Arms. He could not help therefore advancing the money, since the Dukes was not able to do it. But withal he took so great care not to lose his money, that it is visible from the Treaty, his principal aim was the re-payment of his expenses. There are two farther remarks to be made upon his conduct. First, 'tis probable, he would lend his Troops out but for eight months, lest the sum should mount too high, and consequently become difficult to be repaid. Secondly, he was willing not only to secure the principal, but to receive it also with interest. For, after receiving places in mortgage for his security, he left the sum undetermined, in order to have it settled by Commissioners. He knew that when he had the Towns in his hands, Ann would one day be forced to submit to what he should prescribe, and it would be in his power to mount the charges of levying and maintaining his Troops as high as he pleased. What I am saying is not a bare conjecture, since we shall find in the sequel that he raised this expense to an exorbitant sum. Thus Ann was so bound by the Treaty, that this aid was no less expensive to her than the French Army itself, which remained quiet without any attempt, though it still continued in the Country. Charles had fully designed to take advantage of the consternation of the Bretons after the death of their Duke. But in a Council held upon that occasion, the Chancellor de Rochefort was utterly against it, from motives of honour and equity. His opinion made the deeper impression upon the King, as he still feared, that, though the King of England acted but faintly, he would alter his mind. Besides Henry's Embassies to Spain, to the King of the Romans, and to the Archduke, gave the Court of France some uneasiness. They were afraid of a league which would have obstructed the execution of a grand project already formed, and which will be mentioned hereafter.

Bretagne.
Argentré.*

Whilst the Treaty was negotiating at Redon, the Duchess's affairs were in a deplorable state. She not only saw a French Army in the heart of her Country, and in possession of several Towns; but moreover, was destitute of Men and money. What was still more grievous at such a juncture, was the dissension among her principal Lords. The Marfhal de Rieux pretended to govern her, as her guardian. But Philip de Montauban her Chancellor had such an ascendancy over her, that he caused her to consider the Marfhal as an enemy, so that he absolutely refused to be under his guardianship. Montauban's pretence to exasperate her was, that the Marfhal would have married her to the Lord d'Albret. But the Chancellor represented to her that the Marfhal intended to ruin her, by giving her a Husband unable to protect her. He even insinuated that the Marfhal was bribed by the King of France, whose interest it was to marry her to a Lord not supported by any Prince in Europe. It may be the Chancellor was himself gained in favour of the King of the Romans. Be this as it will, their dissension was carried so far, that the Marfhal de Rieux caused the Gates of Nantz to be shut upon the Duchess, and even threatened to besiege her in Rennes. It is not therefore surprising that Montauban, who managed the Duchess's affairs, should agree to the Treaty of Redon; since, by the arrival of the English Forces his party would be exceedingly strengthened.

The English Succours at last arrived in March, which with Henry's Embassies to several Courts, made King Charles imagine, he intended to act vigorously in defence of Bretagne (1). In this belief, finding he could not execute his designs by open force, without entering into war with the English, and drawing perhaps other enemies upon himself, he thought some other course should be taken. There was on foot a Treaty of Peace between him and Maximilian, and between Maximilian and the Gantois, by the mediation of the German Princes, assembled at Francfort. As this affair was in a good way, he did not question that a Peace would ensue. He had in his power, Margaret Daughter of the King of the Romans, in order to espouse her when marriageable, and was not ignorant of the late Duke of Bretagne's engagement with that Prince, concerning his Daughter's marriage. So, not at all doubting, that his future Father-in-law, with whom he was going to conclude a Peace, would be ready to favour him, he sent and offered the Duchess of Bretagne to make him Umpire of their differences. Ann gladly accepted the proposal, being almost sure of the favour of a Prince who expected to marry her, and Maximilian did not want much Intreaty to become arbiter of an affair, in which he himself was so much concerned. Thus Charles, Ann, and Maximilian, acted all three with Infincerity.

at Francfort.*

The Ambassadors of France and Bretagne being met at Francfort, concluded, by the mediation of the King of the Romans, a provisional Treaty, importing, that Charles should restore the places conquered upon Bretagne, except Dinant, St. Aubin, Fougères, and St. Malo: That these four Towns should be committed in trust to Maximilian, and the Duke of Bourbon, and the French Troops march out of the rest of Bretagne: That on her part, the Duchess should send away the English: And in April next, a Congress be held at Tourmay, to adjust all disputes: That, in the mean time, both parties should send their reasons to Avignon, to be examined and discussed by Civilians, that their opinions might serve for the Instruction of the mediators.

This Treaty was without effect, though both Parties seemed pleased with it. Ann was obliged by the Treaty of Redon, to deliver two places to the King of England, and these two places were to be kept by five hundred English. By the present Treaty, she promised to send away all the English. But as the five hundred Men which kept the two places were not excepted, Charles pretended, he was not bound to execute the Treaty of Francfort, till all the English were departed from Bretagne, to which Ann could not oblige them. So, though in November, pursuant to the Treaty of Redon, the English Forces returned into England, the five hundred Men however remained, and it was not in the Duchess's power to send them away, unless she repaid the King of England all his charges, which was impossible. The affair rested therefore in the same state it was before the Treaty of Francfort, and the two parties neither sent their reasons to Avignon, nor their Ambassadors to Tourmay.

Mean time, Maximilian's marriage with Ann was negotiating with all possible secrecy. Maximilian's agents represented to the young Princes, the honour the would enjoy of being Queen of the Romans, and in time, Emperess. But with this honour, she would have wanted a powerful assistance, which her Lover was not able to give her. He could not draw any Forces out of Flanders, and send them to Bretagne, without breaking with France, included in his late Peace with the Gantois. Besides, this Peace was so ill secured, that it did not last a whole year. Thus Maximilian, Son of an Emperor, himself King of the Romans, and Governor of the Low-Countries, had only empty Titles, which gave him little power. Nevertheless, the young Duchess was still made to expect a powerful aid from him, whether her advisers wilfully shut their Eyes, or because there was then no other Prince in Europe, from whom she could hope for any assistance. The King of England might have protected her, but had entertained so wrong a notion of the affair, that the Issue alone was capable to undeceive him.

At last, the Marriage was accomplished in November, with a Ceremony [then altogether new in those parts. For the Prince of Nassau, Ambassador and Proxy of Maximilian, put his naked Leg into the bed where the Duchess was laid, as a sort of Consummation. This was done however with such secrecy, that neither Charles nor Henry appear to have known it, till March 1491. It is true, Argentré, Historian of Bretagne, says, that from the beginning of the year 1490, all the publick Acts ran in the name of Maximilian and Ann. If so, it would be hard to conceive how their marriage could be kept secret. But very probably, Argentré was mistaken one whole year. For we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts of England, several Commissions of the year 1490, in the name of the Duchess alone, and the first there with Maximilian's name, is dated in March 1491 (2).

Though the English Troops were returned, Charles renewed not Hostilities in Bretagne. This forbearance made Henry imagine he had attained his end, that is, had frightened Charles by the sole appearance of rupture. The truth is, Charles was greatly embarrassed. He could not think of letting go Bretagne, and on the other hand, perceived it would be very difficult to finish the Conquest, without drawing on himself a war from England, and perhaps from several other States.

Mean while, Ann seeing the war would infallibly be renewed, as soon as her marriage was divulged, used all her endeavours to convince Henry of the necessity of sending fresh Succours to Bretagne, without discovering however the true reason. For this purpose she sent to him in February 1490, Chancellor Montauban, and other Ambassadors, with orders to desire assistance, and an express power to promise in her name, that she would never marry without his consent (3). This shows, her marriage with Maximilian was still a secret, which she did not think fit to divulge. In their Instructions, the Ambassadors were ordered to acquaint the King with her protestation in form, against her Father's engagement with the Lord d'Albret, and with whatever d'Albret and de Rieux had done to compel her to ratify the same. 1490. was an Infatuation of her wanting his assistance, as well against her own Subjects, as the King of France, and that Bretagne was in danger from both. But all this was not capable to move Henry. Instead of treating with the Dukes about fresh Supplies, he sent Ambassadors to the Dukes (1), with power to treat with King Charles concerning all that Prince's differences with the Dukes of Bretagne. He was still of opinion, that Charles dreading the junction of England with Bretagne, wanted only a Peace. In this belief, he resolved to make him pay for it, insisting upon a fresh demand, hitherto unthought of, namely, the Arrears of the Pension which Lewis XI was bound to pay to Edward IV, by the Treaty of Pequigny, which by a subsequent Treaty, was to continue till the death of the survivor of the two Kings. These Arrears amounted to the Sum of one hundred twenty five thousand Crowns, which the Ambassadors had orders to demand. From that time, this Article was always inserted in the King's Commissions to treat with France. Henry imagined, that in Charles's Treaty with Ann, of which he thought himself almost sure, he would submit to this Article, least it should be an obstacle to the Peace.

Whilst his Ambassadors were in France, he could not dispense with appointing Commissioners to treat with those of Bretagne. But it was only to amuse them. The Negotiation solely tended to a Treaty, which still more strongly than the former, secured him the reimbursement of his Charges on the Dukes's account, without any mention of the desired assistance. The whole amounted to some verbal promises on the King's part, that he would never forsake the Dukes. He believed this assistance was entirely needless in the present situation of the affair, still imagining, King Charles was wholly inclined to a Peace. Mean while, Charles in his turn, amused the English Ambassadors, resolving to conclude nothing, till he could more plainly discover Henry's Intention. He had an army in the bowels of Bretagne, and several Towns in his possession, and Ann was little able to expel him with her own Forces alone. For this reason, he willingly waited for a favorable opportunity to end the affair, otherwise than by the King of England's mediation, of whom he was too jealous. Henry thinking him otherwise disposed, made it his chief business to secure the payment of what he had advanced for the assistance of Bretagne. And therefore, under colour that the City of Nantes was in danger of falling into the hands of the French, he demanded to have it in his power, promising to restore it whenever required. But presently after he heard, the Lord d'Albret had prevented him, and that despatching to marry the Dukes's, he had joined with France, and taken that rich City, where he had made a great Booty.

During these Negotiations, fresh troubles arose in Flanders, very prejudicial to the affairs of the Dukes of Bretagne. The Duke of Saxony, who commanded in Flanders for Maximilian, having published an Edict concerning the Coin, the Inhabitants of Bruges refused to comply with it, and drew the Gantois into their revolt. The King of France, who desired nothing more than to see war kindled in Flanders, sent aid (2) to the rebels, under the Conduct of Marshal Desjardes Governor of Picardy (3). On the other side, Maximilian, or the Duke of Saxony in his name, sent Ambassadors to Henry, to make a League with him against France.

With the aid arrived from Picardy, the rebels made great progress, and after taking Ippe and Sluce, besieged Dixmude. Henry, angry with Charles for delaying his answer so long, and moreover being concerned to support the Archduke, resolved to send him aid. To that purpose, he suddenly dispatched [the Lord Morley (4) with] a thousand Men to Calais, with orders to the Lord D'aueney, Governor of that place, to relieve Dixmude, if possible. D'aueney joining a thousand Men of his Garrison (5), to those come from England, marched directly to Dixmude, which was not well invested. He entered the Town by night without opposition, and at break of day falling out of the opposite gate, fell upon the Camp of the French and Flemings, and entirely routed them (6). This affair bred a great coldness between Charles and Henry. But Charles durst not complain, since he had no more right to assist rebellious Subjects, than had Henry to assist the Sovereign.

Mean time, the Ambassadors of Bretagne waited at London to see manner of purpose. The King gave them however good words, which served only to engage them the more to do his, instead of the Dukes's Affairs. On the 27th of July he required of them, an Acknowledgment that he had punctually executed the Treaty of Redon; a fresh engagement to reimburse all his charge; and a promise to deliver to him Morlaix and Concarneau, upon the hopes of an aid which he never intended to give. However, it was necessary, in order to attain his ends, to make the King of France believe, he really designed to assist the Dukes of Bretagne, since it was the only means to stop his proceedings. Charles seemed to have some knowledge of Henry's thoughts, for he appeared more cold than ever, with respect to his agreement with the Dukes. He returned no direct answer, neither did he talk of restoring his Conquests upon Bretagne, or of paying the Arrears of the Pension due till the death of Edward IV. So, Henry thought it time to proceed more openly, and give that Monarch reason to fear not only the Arms of England but also of several other States. In the beginning of this year he had renewed the Treaties of Alliance with Portugal and Denmark. In September he concluded with Maximilian and his Son Philip, a League against France for their mutual defence, and for that of the Dukes of Bretagne. At the same time he published a Treaty made with Ferdinand and Isabella in March the last year. By this Treaty, the two Kings engaged to make war upon the King of France, unless he would restore Roussillon to Ferdinand, and Guienne and Normandy to Henry. Moreover they agreed upon a Marriage between Arthur Prince of Wales, Henry's Son, and Catherine, third Daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, as soon as the Prince was fourteen, and the Princess twelve years of age. His Treaty with the King of the Romans had relation to this. The three Princes were to enter France at the same time, each at the head of an Army as well for their own, as for the Interests of the Dukes of Bretagne. But by secret Articles signed two days after, there were so many restrictions concerning the time, manner, and conditions of the War, that it plainly appears Henry's sole aim was to frighten the King of France. By one of the secret Articles, the time of this invasion was fixed to the 15th of August, 1492.

The 4th of October, Henry concluded with John Galeazzo Duke of Milan a Treaty of Alliance, containing only general Articles of Amity and good understanding. Mean while, Henry failed not to reap this advantage, that these Negotiations, which were openly transacting, embarrassed the French King. Indeed, all these Treaties, the secret Articles whereof he knew not, gave him uneasiness. He had reason to fear, that a League was forming against him, which would obstruct not only the Conquest of Bretagne, but also that of the Kingdom of Naples, which he had been some time meditating. It was this that hindered his renewing the War in Bretagne, though the Dukes's circumstances were such, that it seemed easy to dispossess her entirely. Besides Henry's conduct appeared to extraordinary, that he knew not what to think. That Monarch made great noise about the League he was forming for the defence of Bretagne, and yet sent no aid. In this uncertainty, Charles resolved to send an Embassy into England, under pretence of taking off Henry from the Dukes's party, but in reality to know by his answer what he was to hope or fear from him. He chose for this purpose Francis de Luxemburg Viscount of Martigue, Waleran de Sams, and Robert Gaguin, General of the Order of the Trinity. These Ambassadors being arrived at London, had their audience of the King, where nothing particular passed. Some days after, the King having nominated to treat with them Richard Fox Bishop of Exeter, Thomas Earl of Ormond, and some others (7), in their first conference, the General of the Order of the Trinity being the Speaker, made the most submissive and cringing Speech that ever came out of the mouth of a French Ambassador to a foreign Prince, if after all the matter is to be referred to Henry VII's Historian. As I have several reasons to suspect this Speech to be rather the Historian's than the Ambassador's, I shall only relate the principal points, without keeping to the very words, or mentioning certain Articles which seem to me altogether improbable (8).

“ had sent them to pray a Peace with the King of England, and his respect for that great Prince induced him to pass by all formalities, and make advances unusual in such Sovereigns as he. He would not however conceal from him another motive which made him desirous of Peace. Having resolved to carry his Arms into remote Countries, it could not but be for his advantage, that all the World should know he was in friendship with all his Neighbours, and particularly with the King of England. Then the Ambassador himself took care to excuse Henry's sending aid into Bretagne and Flanders, though it was against France, and owned it to be no just cause of rupture between the two Crowns. As for Flanders, he justified the King his master's sending Troops thither, because it was his duty to protect the Flemings his Vassals (1), against the King of the Romans their Oppressor. After that, the Ambassador added, King Charles intended to make war upon the Kingdom of Naples, unjustly detained from him by a Barba of the House of Aragon. That Kingdom belonging to him by undoubted right, he was bound in honour to try to recover it. But his thoughts did not rest there, his purpose being to make the Conquest of Naples serve as a Bridge to transport his Forces into the East, and overthrow the Empire of the Turks, to which he was invited, as by a Voice from Heaven, by a Rent in the Ottoman Family. This therefore being his resolution for a holy War, he was content for the honour and advantage of the Christian religion, to beg Peace at the hands of all the Princes of Europe, that he might not be diverted by any obstacle from them. The Ambassador concluded with saying, “ He had only another Affair to mention, not as a subject of Treaty, but as a mark of his Master's great desire to preserve a good understanding with the King of England, namely, Being Sovereign Lord of Bretagne, and as such Guardian of the Ducheys, he requested that with the King of England's consent, he might dispose of her marriage as he should think fit.”

The Chancellor's Answer in the King's Name.
Bacon.

Some days after, the Ambassadors of France being sent for to the Council, the Chancellor returned them the following Answer from the King: “ That the King his Master had not forgot his former love and friendship with the King of France. That if the friendship was still the same, there was no occasion to talk of it: But if not, it was not words but deeds that must renew it: That as for the Affair of Bretagne, he could not help thinking it strange that the King of France should make him his instrument to ruin one of his best Allies, and moreover pretend, he was very much obliged to him for it: As for the Ducheys's marriage, he meant not to meddle with it, provided the King of France would proceed by Law and not by the Sword: That however, what had passed in Bretagne as well as in Flanders did not make so deep an impression, as to refuse to treat of Peace, if all their other Affairs might be debated at the same time. That as for the War upon Naples, the King had but one thing to say, which was, as the King of France thought himself bound in honour to try to recover that Kingdom, so for the same reason the King thought himself obliged to exert his utmost for the recovery of Guienne, Normandy, and the Kingdom of France itself, which of right belonged to him.”

He demands it in French.

Motives of the Demand.

Henry had easily discovered the design of this Embassy, and that, by a general proposal to live in peace with him, Charles had no other view than to found his intentions with respect to Bretagne. Wherefore, according to the maxim he had established, which was to frighten him, he threatened a War, not only for the interest of the Ducheys of Bretagne, but also for his own. Mean while, it is likely he spoiled his affairs by carrying the artifice too far, and that Charles was sensible, this answer was only bare words, which would not be followed by deeds. It was not at all probable, that in the then situation of France, Henry who tottered as it were in the Throne of a Kingdom full of Male-content, would renew a quarrel of that importance, of which he could not naturally expect to see a happy Issue. His reputation for being one of the most prudent Princes of his time, made it incredible that he would embark in such an undertaking. So Charles taking for granted, that he intended only to frighten him, still pursued his course, with respect to Bretagne, and succeeded in the end, as will be seen under the next year. On the other hand, his Ambassadors, surprized at the Chancellor's Speech, answered with warmth, that the King their Sovereign feared not such threats, and was able to maintain his just rights against any person whatever (2). The Chancellor calmly replied, the King expected no other answer from them; but would forthwith send Ambassadors to the King of France, to acquaint him more fully with his intentions. Then he asked them whether the King of France would agree to have the disposal of the marriage of the Ducheys of Bretagne, with an exception that he should not marry her himself (3). The Ambassadors answered, the King their master was so far from any thoughts of marrying the Ducheys of Bretagne, that he had given them no instructions upon that head.

During all these Negotiations, Ann was extremely troubled to see no aid come either from Maximilian or the King of England. She had hitherto kept her marriage secret; but perceiving it could not be concealed any longer, and that it was not honorable to hide it from him whom she deemed her principal Protector, sent a solemn Embassy into England, consisting of the Prince of Orange, the Earl of Dumais, and the Chancellor. Their business was to desire aid, and probably, notify her marriage to the King. For, till after this Embassy which arrived in England the beginning of the next year, we do not find in the Publick Acts, Maximilian's name joined with her's.

In February 1491 Henry sent Ambassadors into France (4) according to his promise. Their Commission was, to treat of all his differences with King Charles, and in particular of a certain sum due to him from that Prince, as also of the affair between Charles and the Ducheys of Bretagne. These instructions alone are a clear evidence, that Henry designed not vigorously to push his pretensions to the Realm of France, or at least, to Guienne and Normandy. For, is it probable that he would have comprized under the general word Differences his claim to all France, or to two of the richest Provinces, and have specified a debt of a hundred and twenty-five thousand Crowns, if the first had been the principal? It is therefore manifest, he still persisted in his desire to end the affair of Bretagne without War, and to secure the sums he had advanced.

A few days after, he appointed Commissioners to treat with the Ambassadors that came hither from Bretagne. Then it was probably, that the Ducheys's marriage with Maximilian was imparted to him (5). Perhaps he was told of it before, though he pretended ignorance, because it had not been notified to him in form.

Mean while, Charles having at last heard of this marriage, which had been made a great secret, resolved to use no more ceremony, but vigorously hasten the conquest of Bretagne. In all appearance, he plainly saw through all Henry's disguises, and perhaps believed the acquisition of Bretagne well worth the hazarding a rupture with England. As for Maximilian, he did not much fear him, and had an infallible expedient to pacify the King of Aragon, by restoring Roussillon, much less important to the Crown of France than Bretagne. So, without further consideration, he ordered Rennes, Capital of the Duchy, to be invested, where the Princes then was. During the Siege, which lasted some months, Ann sent into England, John Bouteiller Lord of Maupertuis, and Peter Cojaulx, to desire Henry's assistance. Shortly after he sent also the Countess de la Val, and the Marshal de Rieux, and some others, to inform him of her condition, and demonstrate to him, that Bretagne was going to fall into the hands of France. This Embassy furnished the King with a pretence to borrow money of his Subjects, to enable him to make war upon France. And yet, though he seemed extremely in haste, he gave no orders for levying Troops, but was very intent upon collecting the Loans.

Not long after, the League between Henry and Ferdinand was renewed. They agreed once more, that in May, or at farthest in June the next year (6), each should enter France at the head of an army. Maximilian promised likewise to do the same, and sent an aid of two thousand Men to his Ducheys. But all this tended only to make a great noise, in order to deter the King of France from his design to conquer Bretagne. It was not the intention either of Henry, or Ferdinand, or Maximilian, to make war upon France. Ferdinand was then 1491. entirely employed in the War of Granada, and if he leagued with Henry, it was only to oblige King Charles by the terror of the League, to restore him Rouffillon, being very ready to desist the moment he should be possessed of that Province. Maximilian's aim, who had neither Men nor Money, was to engage the Kings of England and Spain in a War with France, and reap all the fruit, by the possession of the Duches and Duchy of Bretagne. So, Henry not being able to depend in any measure upon such Allies, and seeing Bretagne almost lost, was unwilling to engage alone in its defence. His sole aim was to secure by the dread of this League, the payment of what was owed him by France and Bretagne. Mean while, Henry and Ferdinand, in order to attain their ends, were to feign a real intention to make war upon France.

Charles VIII. Whilft these two Monarchs were taking measures to accomplish their designs, and the Ambassadors of Bretagne were waiting in vain at London, Charles caused the Siege of Rennes to be continued. But finding the Siege was in an ill way, and the season now far advanced, he fought and found a readier and more effectual means than the sword to secure the possession of Bretagne. He gained, by his liberalities, all the young Duches's Counsellors, who should persuade her to break off her marriage with Maximilian, and take himself for her Husband. Perhaps he had formed that project before. But however, he first discovered it during the Siege of Rennes. When he was secure of the concurrence of the Lords of Bretagne, he caused the Duches, then above fifteen years of age, to be

He gains her Council. Hall.

She is first to be importuned, that she had not a moment's repose. She at first courageously withstood all their solicitations, affirming, she could not resolve to be false to a Prince whom she had voluntarily espoused. But it was represented to her, That Maximilian had forsaken her first: That instead of coming in person to defend her, or at least, of sending her aids proportionable to her wants, he had remained quietly in Germany, as if what passed in Bretagne no way concerned him: That in the present posture of affairs, it was impossible to hinder Bretagne from becoming a Province of France, and then Maximilian would regard her still less, when he saw her dispossessed of her Dominions: Nay, perhaps she would have the confusion to see that he himself would cancel his marriage, and so lose at once both her Duchy and Spouse, and reduce her Subjects to slavery: That in marrying the King of France, she might secure by a Treaty, the Sovereignty and Liberties of Bretagne; whereas, by an obstinate and fruitless defence, she would ruin her Subjects, without reaping any advantage herself. In fine, That the King of France was more proper for one of her age: That the glorious title of Queen of the Romans, and Empress, ought not to tempt her, since that of Queen of France, with a real Kingdom, was not of less value. Mean while, as the Duches resisted, Charles thought of another expedient to conquer her resolution. He went himself and took the Duke of Orleans out of the Tower of Bourges, where he was confined after the battle of St. Aubin, and told him, that knowing how great confidence the young Duches of Bretagne placed in him, he required him, in return for his freedom, to try to persuade her to comply with his desires. The Duke of Orleans, who was tired of his imprisonment, willingly accepted of the Office, and repairing to Rennes, succeeded at last in determining the Duches to the marriage, which was accordingly concluded December the 16th, 1491.

who prevailed with his desires. The Duke of Orleans, who was tired of his imprisonment, willingly accepted of the Office, and repairing to Rennes, succeeded at last in determining the Duches to the marriage, which was accordingly concluded December the 16th, 1491.

The Ambassadors of his Negotiation with Ann. At last, the Ambassadors hearing the marriage was upon the point of conclusion, withdrew about the end of November, without taking leave. Thus Henry saw, not without confusion, that he had lost the fruit of his avaritious Policy, not only as he had not saved Bretagne, but chiefly as the reimbursement of the sums he had advanced, was become more precarious than ever. Nevertheless, he had still one refuge left, which he knew how to improve, and which brought him off, if not with honour, at least with a pecuniary advantage, the thing he had all along aimed at. Happily for him, Charles was possessed with his design to conquer the Kingdom of Naples. As a rupture with England would have laid invincible Obstacles in his way, he thought it should by all means be avoided. Henry on his part, well knowing that, in the present juncture, Charles would not scruple to purchase a Peace, feigned an extreme repentment of the affront he had received, and a resolution to be revenged at any rate. The moment his Ambassadors made their report, he issued out orders to levy Forces, and prepare Transports, intimating, he was ready to undertake the most dreadful War that had ever been between England and France (1). He seemed to prepare to tread in the steps of Edward III and Henry V, and not think of resting till he had forced the Crown of France from the House of Valois. We shall see presently to what all this ardour tended.

Maximilian was enraged when he heard Charles had thus injuriously robbed him of his Wife. He threatened, like Henry, to carry Fire and Sword into the heart of France, in revenge of so deadly an affront. On the other hand, the Archduke Philip demanded his Sister Margaret who was at Paris, and affianced to King Charles. But the Court of France did not yet think fit to send back that Princess. They feared neither Father nor Son. Their whole attention was employed in laying the storm with which they were threatened from England and Spain, and which appeared much more violent than it really was. But before I relate the effects of this quarrel, it will be necessary briefly to mention the affairs of Scotland.

Since James IV's accession to the Crown of Scotland, he had found it very difficult to maintain himself in the Throne. The troubles which immediately broke out, still continued by the Policy of the King of England, who took care to foment them. He gave from time to time the Scott Male-contents some little aids, which enabled them to support themselves, but not to make any great progress against their King. It is a Policy very usual with Princes, to cherish the troubles of their Neighbours, in a belief that it is a most effectual way to preserve Peace at home, though there are some who would scruple to use such means. But Henry was not of this number. He even seems to have been less scrupulous than many others, since we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the Lord Bathuel and Sir Thomas Tod, both Scots, had engaged to deliver into his hands the Person of the King of Scotland, and the Duke of Ros his Brother, which could not be done without notorious treachery. It even appears by the Record, that he had lent the Earl of Boghan and Sir Thomas Tod, 266 l. 13 s. 4 d. Sterling, to enable them to execute this design, and that Tod left his Son in hostage for security. This Act is dated April the 17th, 1491.

This project miscarrying, Henry who was preparing for the war with France, would first be secured from the diversions, the Scots might make in England during his absence. James for his part, desired nothing more than to deprive those of his Subjects that were in arms against him, of the protection ever afforded them by the King of England. So, the two Kings sending their Ambassadors to Caldestream upon Tweed, a Treaty of Truce was concluded, from the 21st of December, to that day five years 1496. By this Treaty, the City of Berwick, with its Territory, was to stand neuter, and the Lordship of Lorn in Scotland, with the little Island of Lundy belonging to England, were excepted out of the Truce. Henry ratified the Treaty January the 9th, 1492. But probably, the King of Scotland, whether bribed by France, or from some other motive, refused to confirm it. He agreed however, to a much shorter Truce, from the 20th of February 1492, to the 20th of November following.

France seemed to be threatened from all sides with a furious war. Maximilian pressed it to the utmost of his power, reckoning that his Son Philip, then twenty years old, would make a powerful diversion in Flanders, whilst the Allies acted in other places. Henry was openly preparing for war with great noise and boastings. In fine, Ferdinand and Isabella, who had lately put a glorious period to the war with the Moor, by the taking of Granada, publicly threatened to invade France: Charles therefore would have been in great danger, had this powerful League been in reality, what it was in appearance. After taking possession of Bretagne, he thought of executing his grand project, concerning the Conquest of Naples. But he must first dispel the storm that was gathering in Spain, England, and Flanders. Whilft he was wholly employed in this affair, Henry was no less intent upon his own concerns.

In the beginning of the year 1492, he assembled a Parliament, and communicated to both Houses his design to carry war into France, not with intent to ask their advice, as in the case of Bretagne, but to acquaint them with his resolution to exert his utmost endeavours to recover the Kingdom of France, which he called the Inheritance of his Ancestors. To inflame them the more, he set before them the glorious Battles of Creay, Politiers, and Azincourt, where the English alone, with a small

(1) He retained several Persons by Indenture, to serve him in this War, who had the following allowance. For every Man at Arms, given him with a Culverin [i. e. Servant] and Page, Eighteen-pence a day: For every half Lance, Nine-pence a day: And for every Archer, either on foot or horse-back, Six-pence a day. See Rymer's Fœd. Tom. XII. p. 47:—480.

1492. number of Troops, vanquished the strongest armies of France. He would thereby insinuate, that he was no less a Warrior than Edward III., the Prince of Wales his Son, and Henry V. In demanding an aid of Money proportionable to the greatness of the enterprize, he exhorted the Commons to spare the purses of the poor, and lay the Tax upon the rich, not at all questioning, whether what he required would be granted. Certainly great fault might have been found with his management of the former Subsidy. It was granted for the defence of Bretagne, and yet the Duchy was lost without his using the least endeavours to prevent it. But the Conquest of the Kingdom of France was a very proper decoy to draw in the Parliament. The truth is, the King had no desire to embark in so hazardous an undertaking. He knew that France being now at unity with itself, the Conquest of it would be too difficult a task. Of his two Allies, the one had Will but not Power, and the other had Power but not Will; Ferdinand's aim being, by shew of war to attain a Peace, which might procure him the restitution of Rouffillon. Besides, as he had but newly ended his war with the Moor, he was not in condition to begin another with France. However, Henry exprested to his Parliament and Council, an ardent desire to render his name famous, by the Conquest of France, or at least of Normandy and Guinne. Herein he had a view to his profit two ways, upon his Subjects for a Subsidy for the War, and upon his Enemies for a Peace, which would secure him the payment of what was due to him. He easily fore-saw, that the defection of the King of the Romans, and of Ferdinand, would afford him a plausible excuse to desist from a war he was undertaking with so much noise. The Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Exeter, were the only persons that knew his real Intentions. Shortly after, the laft was removed to the See of Bath and Wells.

The Parliament took fire, as the King expected, and granted him a very considerable Sum, which, pursuant to his desire, was to be levied upon the rich, by the name of Benevolence (1). This sort of Tax was introduced by Edward IV., and raised without consent of Parliament. Richard III., to ingratiate himself with the people, abolished it, but this Parliament revived it (2), and gave it the Seal of their Authority (3).

Shortly after, Henry received Ambassadors from King Charles, with proposals that were not made publick. There was reason to believe, nothing was concluded in their Conferences with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Bishop Joss, since the warlike preparations were still seen to continue. However, very likely, these Ambassadors laid the first foundations of the Peace, which was made before the end of the year.

In June (4) the Queen was delivered of a Prince, who succeeded the King his Father by the name of Henry VIII.

The preparations which were making in England were very sensible for the Archduke Philip. Since the last year the Gantins had revolted once more, and set at their head Philip de Cleves, a great stickler for France. Some troubles in Holland preventing the Archduke from endeavouring to suppress this revolt, it was the middle of this year before he marched against Philip de Cleves, and besieged him in Sluice. He would have found it difficult to take that place, if Henry had not sent him twelve Ships, and two thousand five hundred Men (5). With this aid he was enabled to compel the rebels to sue for Peace, and deliver Sluice into his hands.

As the King had no Intention to push vigorously the war with France, he hastened not his preparations, being glad to begin the Campaign late, in order to end it the sooner. Mean while, he sent Ambassadors to France (6), to shew he was willing to try fair means before he proceeded to arms. But it is extremely probable, this Embassy was sent only to finish, with King Charles, the Terms of Peace. Moreover, the King's honour was to be secured, who after making so much noise, was unwilling to desist, without a seeming necessity. To that end he must act in concert with the King of France. At the same time, Henry sent Ambassadors (7) to the King of the Romans, and to Ferdinand, to summon them to take the Field and enter France according to their Treaty. But he knew they had neither Power nor Will to perform their engagements. Maximilian had no army, and Ferdinand was now in Treaty with Charles, for the restitution of Rouffillon. And yet, Henry pretending Ignorance of these things, seemed to have great dependence upon them. In the beginning of August, he issued out orders for the levying a greater number of Forces, and on the 22d of the same month, appointed Commissioners to confer at Caldestream, with those of Scotland. All this afforded him pretences to delay his expedition. At length, though not till the 2d of October (8), he came to Dover in order to embark (9), having constituted by Patent his eldest Son Arthur Prince of Wales, Guardian of the Realm. Such of his Courtiers who were ignorant of his designs, could not forbear telling him, it was very late to begin a Campaign. But he answered, That he intended not to make a Summer's Business of the war, and therefore it did not signify when it began. That he had Calais at his back, where he might winter, in order to be ready to open the Campaign early next Spring. He arrived the same day at Bacon, where his whole army being assembled, amounted to twenty five thousand Foot, and sixteen hundred Horse (10).

Before he embarked, Henry received a Letter from the Marfhal Desjardes, offering a Negotiation of Peace in England (11). But he thought it more proper, in order to save appearances, to treat in France itself. He was scarce landed at Calais, when the Ambassadors sent to the King of the Romans arrived, and told him, that Maximilian was wholly unprepared to enter France as he had promised. This news was immediately made known to the whole army. Some days after, he received from his Ambassadors in Spain, Letters which were likewise made publick, importing, that Ferdinand had concluded a Peace with the King of France, upon promise to restore Rouffillon, without demanding the three hundred thousand Crowns lent by Lewis XI. upon that Country. Henry knew all this before, but had so ordered, that these advices came together after his arrival in France, that it might appear, he was forced to the Peace he intended to make. Upon these advices, at which he feigned to be very much surprized, he agreed, that Richard Fox Bishop of Bath and Wells, and the Lord d'Aubigny Governor of Calais should enter into Conference at Espleple, with the Marfhal Desjardes. He marched however the 15th of October, to besiege Boulogne, and in four days appeared before the Place. It must be remarked, that King Charles was then at Tours, and though the warlike preparations in England had made great noise, there was no army in Picardy to oppose the Invasion of the English; at least History mentions no such thing. This is a clear evidence that all Henry's proceedings were concerted with the King of France, who was not so unprovided with Troops, but he could have sent an army sufficient to stop his progress. So, this pretended Siege of Boulogne was only an artifice to discourage the English, that by considering the difficulties of a Siege at such a Season, they might be the less surprized at a Peace. At the end of eight days, Henry received at the Camp before Boulogne, the Articles of Peace agreed by the Commissioners of both parties, with the approbation of the two Kings, the substance whereof was as follows:

- I. That the King of France should discharge the debt contracted by his Queen for the defence of Bretagne, which debt, according to the English Ambassadors account, amounted to six hundred and twenty thousand Crowns of Gold, French Money, which is 124,000 l. Sterling.
- II. That the King of France should pay the King of England the Arrears of the yearly pension of fifty thou-

III. That the King of France should pay these two debts at several times, namely, fifty thousand Livres every year, every Livre at twenty Scutz, or Crowns, and to be paid half-yearly, till the whole was paid.

IV. Whereas in the obligation given by the Duches of Bretagne to the King of England, there was no Sum specified, the King of England should be obliged to make proof of his debt before Commissioners of Bretagne or France, to be sent to England for that purpose.

V. That the two Kings should name such of their Allies as they meant to include in the Peace, who should be obliged to declare within four months, whether they would be included or not.

VI. That in case the King of the Romans, and the Archduke Philip his Son desired to be included in the Treaty, and if afterwards the King of France should, in any manner whatever, invade their Country, it should be lawful for the King of England to assist them. But if, on the contrary, they should attack the King of France, the King of England should give them no aid.

VII. That in case the two Kings approved of these Articles, they should give each other Hostages till the Treaty was drawn and signed in form.

Henry's intentions, but for a full view of them, see the French Articles, which exactly corresponded with Henry's intentions, from the beginning of the War of Bretagne, there is no question that they were framed by himself or his own Ambassadors. And yet, he would have them pass for Proposals from the French King, and feigned to doubt whether he should accept or reject them. For that purpose, he called a Council of all the Lords and general Officers, and sent them the Articles, with his orders to give him their real opinion. As probably this Council was managed by some person of great credit who was in the King's secret, all that were present unanimously agreed, he ought to accept of the Terms. They gave their reasons in a long memorial under all their hands, which in short, omitting the Exaggerations, were as follow:

Their reason I. The first reason was taken from the length of the
for so doing nights, the coldness of the Weather, the want of Provi-
p. 490. sions as they were to come by Sea, the fear of Distempers, and the like.

II. The second reason was founded upon the consideration of the Sum offered, far exceeding any ever yet paid by France to the King's Predecessors; and likewise, upon the apprehension of the Murmuring's refusal of a Peace might occasion in England and in the Army.

III. They alledged as a third reason, the great advantage that would accrue by the Peace to the King of the Romans and the Archduke: The benefit they had already received in the restitution of Sluce: And lastly, the fruits which the English Merchants would reap, since the Peace would secure their Commerce with Flanders.

IV. They said, the King had honorably kept his word with his Allies, notwithstanding the instances of his Council, who solicited him to defer his expedition to a more convenient Season, and till his Allies should be ready: That he had led his Army into France, put himself in condition to encounter alone all the Enemy's Forces, and exposed his person to the greatest dangers, at a time when his Allies disappointed him. That therefore, if the War was not continued, he might very justly cast the blame upon them.

V. That the King was far from being in the same situation with Edward IV. when he led an Army into France: That Edward was joined by the Duke of Burgundy with all his Forces, and by several French Lords who were in his interest: That he was in possession of all the Towns as far as the Somme, and began the War in the middle of Summer: That, on the contrary, the King was not assisted with any foreign Troops: That when he marched out of the Gates of Calais, he entred the Enemy's Country, and was advanced to Boulogne: That he had razed several Places, as Ardes and Montreuy, and had stood four and twenty Days ready for Battle, defying the Armies of France.

VI. That very likely, the People of England would thank the King for a Peace which would put an end to Taxes and Exactions, and restore the publick Tranquillity.

VII. They added once more, that the restoring the Archduke to his Dominions, would redound to the King's honor, and the Nation's advantage, by reason of their Trade with his Subjects.

VIII. They said, that before the Siege at Fontenoy, it was thought to be a weak Place and e^{asy} to be taken; but, on the contrary, it was found to be well fortified, strongly garrisoned, and plentifully provided with Artillery and Provisions. That therefore, in all appearance, it the King continued the Siege, he would be forced to raise it with disgrace, whereas by making a Peace, he could retire with honor.

IX. Their last reason was, that it was impracticable to continue the War during the Winter, without utterly destroying the Army, which would extremely afflict the whole Kingdom.

If these reasons are never so little considered, they will be found to be all false and deceitful, except the Article of the money, which was the only true one. Without weighing them too particularly, I shall only observe, that of all the inconveniences alledged by the Officers, there was not one but what the King might have foreseen, and actually did foresee. He could blame himself only for beginning the Campaign so late. All in the 5th Article concerning Edward IV is evidently false. As for the murmurs of the People, which were pretended to be feared in case the King rejected the Peace, it was much more probable, on the contrary, that the Nation would murmur to see the money given for a War with France, employed in making a dishonourable Peace, advantageous only to the King. In a word, the King's precaution to cause this Peace to be approved by the Officers of his Army was a clear evidence, he was himself convinced of the little advantage it would be to England.

Henry feigning to be determined by these reasons to ac-^{Trans. com-} to ratify it within a year after his Accession to the Crown. ^{Philip p-} I imagine this was an expedient devised to excuse the ^{Philip p-} falseness concerning the Kingdom of France, or at least, ^{Philip p-} Guineus and Normandy, of which there was no mention, ^{Philip p-} though the War was proclaimed solely upon that occasion. ^{Philip p-} Mean while, this Treaty, which properly concerned only ^{Philip p-} the payment of two debts, was to be approved and con- ^{Philip p-} firmed by the States of France, and the Parliament of ^{Philip p-} England. This shews, it was not considered as a bare ^{Philip p-} Truce, and indeed it was called a Treaty of Peace. Can any ^{Philip p-} thing be more like a Truce? However this be, Henry ^{Philip p-} took great care to see that the King of France ratified ^{Philip p-} every particular Article of the Treaty, and especially those ^{Philip p-} concerning the payment of the money. Charles was ^{Philip p-} likewise, on his part, very punctual in paying the fifty ^{Philip p-} thousand Livres every year (2), as was also Lewis XII ^{Philip p-}

After this manner ended the War of Bretagne, which ^{Robertus} ^{Britannicus} ¹¹⁷¹ ¹¹⁷² ¹¹⁷³ ¹¹⁷⁴ ¹¹⁷⁵ ¹¹⁷⁶ ¹¹⁷⁷ ¹¹⁷⁸ ¹¹⁷⁹ ¹¹⁸⁰ ¹¹⁸¹ ¹¹⁸² ¹¹⁸³ ¹¹⁸⁴ ¹¹⁸⁵ ¹¹⁸⁶ ¹¹⁸⁷ ¹¹⁸⁸ ¹¹⁸⁹ ¹¹⁹⁰ ¹¹⁹¹ ¹¹⁹² ¹¹⁹³ ¹¹⁹⁴ ¹¹⁹⁵ ¹¹⁹⁶ ¹¹⁹⁷ ¹¹⁹⁸ ¹¹⁹⁹ ¹²⁰⁰ ¹²⁰¹ ¹²⁰² ¹²⁰³ ¹²⁰⁴ ¹²⁰⁵ ¹²⁰⁶ ¹²⁰⁷ ¹²⁰⁸ ¹²⁰⁹ ¹²¹⁰ ¹²¹¹ ¹²¹² ¹²¹³ ¹²¹⁴ ¹²¹⁵ ¹²¹⁶ ¹²¹⁷ ¹²¹⁸ ¹²¹⁹ ¹²²⁰ ¹²²¹ ¹²²² ¹²²³ ¹²²⁴ ¹²²⁵ ¹²²⁶ ¹²²⁷ ¹²²⁸ ¹²²⁹ ¹²³⁰ ¹²³¹ ¹²³² ¹²³³ ¹²³⁴ ¹²³⁵ ¹²³⁶ ¹²³⁷ ¹²³⁸ ¹²³⁹ ¹²⁴⁰ ¹²⁴¹ ¹²⁴² ¹²⁴³ ¹²⁴⁴ ¹²⁴⁵ ¹²⁴⁶ ¹²⁴⁷ ¹²⁴⁸ ¹²⁴⁹ ¹²⁵⁰ ¹²⁵¹ ¹²⁵² ¹²⁵³ ¹²⁵⁴ ¹²⁵⁵ ¹²⁵⁶ ¹²⁵⁷ ¹²⁵⁸ ¹²⁵⁹ ¹²⁶⁰ ¹²⁶¹ ¹²⁶² ¹²⁶³ ¹²⁶⁴ ¹²⁶⁵ ¹²⁶⁶ ¹²⁶⁷ ¹²⁶⁸ ¹²⁶⁹ ¹²⁷⁰ ¹²⁷¹ ¹²⁷² ¹²⁷³ ¹²⁷⁴ ¹²⁷⁵ ¹²⁷⁶ ¹²⁷⁷ ¹²⁷⁸ ¹²⁷⁹ ¹²⁸⁰ ¹²⁸¹ ¹²⁸² ¹²⁸³ ¹²⁸⁴ ¹²⁸⁵ ¹²⁸⁶ ¹²⁸⁷ ¹²⁸⁸ ¹²⁸⁹ ¹²⁹⁰ ¹²⁹¹ ¹²⁹² ¹²⁹³ ¹²⁹⁴ ¹²⁹⁵ ¹²⁹⁶ ¹²⁹⁷ ¹²⁹⁸ ¹²⁹⁹ ¹³⁰⁰ ¹³⁰¹ ¹³⁰² ¹³⁰³ ¹³⁰⁴ ¹³⁰⁵ ¹³⁰⁶ ¹³⁰⁷ ¹³⁰⁸ ¹³⁰⁹ ¹³¹⁰ ¹³¹¹ ¹³¹² ¹³¹³ ¹³¹⁴ ¹³¹⁵ ¹³¹⁶ ¹³¹⁷ ¹³¹⁸ ¹³¹⁹ ¹³²⁰ ¹³²¹ ¹³²² ¹³²³ ¹³²⁴ ¹³²⁵ ¹³²⁶ ¹³²⁷ ¹³²⁸ ¹³²⁹ ¹³³⁰ ¹³³¹ ¹³³² ¹³³³ ¹³³⁴ ¹³³⁵ ¹³³⁶ ¹³³⁷ ¹³³⁸ ¹³³⁹ ¹³⁴⁰ ¹³⁴¹ ¹³⁴² ¹³⁴³ ¹³⁴⁴ ¹³⁴⁵ ¹³⁴⁶ ¹³⁴⁷ ¹³⁴⁸ ¹³⁴⁹ ¹³⁵⁰ ¹³⁵¹ ¹³⁵² ¹³⁵³ ¹³⁵⁴ ¹³⁵⁵ ¹³⁵⁶ ¹³⁵⁷ ¹³⁵⁸ ¹³⁵⁹ ¹³⁶⁰ ¹³⁶¹ ¹³⁶² ¹³⁶³ ¹³⁶⁴ ¹³⁶⁵ ¹³⁶⁶ ¹³⁶⁷ ¹³⁶⁸ ¹³⁶⁹ ¹³⁷⁰ ¹³⁷¹ ¹³⁷² ¹³⁷³ ¹³⁷⁴ ¹³⁷⁵ ¹³⁷⁶ ¹³⁷⁷ ¹³⁷⁸ ¹³⁷⁹ ¹³⁸⁰ ¹³⁸¹ ¹³⁸² ¹³⁸³ ¹³⁸⁴ ¹³⁸⁵ ¹³⁸⁶ ¹³⁸⁷ ¹³⁸⁸ ¹³⁸⁹ ¹³⁹⁰ ¹³⁹¹ ¹³⁹² ¹³⁹³ ¹³⁹⁴ ¹³⁹⁵ ¹³⁹⁶ ¹³⁹⁷ ¹³⁹⁸ ¹³⁹⁹ ¹⁴⁰⁰ ¹⁴⁰¹ ¹⁴⁰² ¹⁴⁰³ ¹⁴⁰⁴ ¹⁴⁰⁵ ¹⁴⁰⁶ ¹⁴⁰⁷ ¹⁴⁰⁸ ¹⁴⁰⁹ ¹⁴¹⁰ ¹⁴¹¹ ¹⁴¹² ¹⁴¹³ ¹⁴¹⁴ ¹⁴¹⁵ ¹⁴¹⁶ ¹⁴¹⁷ ¹⁴¹⁸ ¹⁴¹⁹ ¹⁴²⁰ ¹⁴²¹ ¹⁴²² ¹⁴²³ ¹⁴²⁴ ¹⁴²⁵ ¹⁴²⁶ ¹⁴²⁷ ¹⁴²⁸ ¹⁴²⁹ ¹⁴³⁰ ¹⁴³¹ ¹⁴³² ¹⁴³³ ¹⁴³⁴ ¹⁴³⁵ ¹⁴³⁶ ¹⁴³⁷ ¹⁴³⁸ ¹⁴³⁹ ¹⁴⁴⁰ ¹⁴⁴¹ ¹⁴⁴² ¹⁴⁴³ ¹⁴⁴⁴ ¹⁴⁴⁵ ¹⁴⁴⁶ ¹⁴⁴⁷ ¹⁴⁴⁸ ¹⁴⁴⁹ ¹⁴⁵⁰ ¹⁴⁵¹ ¹⁴⁵² ¹⁴⁵³ ¹⁴⁵⁴ ¹⁴⁵⁵ ¹⁴⁵⁶ ¹⁴⁵⁷ ¹⁴⁵⁸ ¹⁴⁵⁹ ¹⁴⁶⁰ ¹⁴⁶¹ ¹⁴⁶² ¹⁴⁶³ ¹⁴⁶⁴ ¹⁴⁶⁵ ¹⁴⁶⁶ ¹⁴⁶⁷ ¹⁴⁶⁸ ¹⁴⁶⁹ ¹⁴⁷⁰ ¹⁴⁷¹ ¹⁴⁷² ¹⁴⁷³ ¹⁴⁷⁴ ¹⁴⁷⁵ ¹⁴⁷⁶ ¹⁴⁷⁷ ¹⁴⁷⁸ ¹⁴⁷⁹ ¹⁴⁸⁰ ¹⁴⁸¹ ¹⁴⁸² ¹⁴⁸³ ¹⁴⁸⁴ ¹⁴⁸⁵ ¹⁴⁸⁶ ¹⁴⁸⁷ ¹⁴⁸⁸ ¹⁴⁸⁹ ¹⁴⁹⁰ ¹⁴⁹¹ ¹⁴⁹² ¹⁴⁹³ ¹⁴⁹⁴ ¹⁴⁹⁵ ¹⁴⁹⁶ ¹⁴⁹⁷ ¹⁴⁹⁸ ¹⁴⁹⁹ ¹⁵⁰⁰ ¹⁵⁰¹ ¹⁵⁰² ¹⁵⁰³ ¹⁵⁰⁴ ¹⁵⁰⁵ ¹⁵⁰⁶ ¹⁵⁰⁷ ¹⁵⁰⁸ ¹⁵⁰⁹ ¹⁵¹⁰ ¹⁵¹¹ ¹⁵¹² ¹⁵¹³ ¹⁵¹⁴ ¹⁵¹⁵ ¹⁵¹⁶ ¹⁵¹⁷ ¹⁵¹⁸ ¹⁵¹⁹ ¹⁵²⁰ ¹⁵²¹ ¹⁵²² ¹⁵²³ ¹⁵²⁴ ¹⁵²⁵ ¹⁵²⁶ ¹⁵²⁷ ¹⁵²⁸ ¹⁵²⁹ ¹⁵³⁰ ¹⁵³¹ ¹⁵³² ¹⁵³³ ¹⁵³⁴ ¹⁵³⁵ ¹⁵³⁶ ¹⁵³⁷ ¹⁵³⁸ ¹⁵³⁹ ¹⁵⁴⁰ ¹⁵⁴¹ ¹⁵⁴² ¹⁵⁴³ ¹⁵⁴⁴ ¹⁵⁴⁵ ¹⁵⁴⁶ ¹⁵⁴⁷ ¹⁵⁴⁸ ¹⁵⁴⁹ ¹⁵⁵⁰ ¹⁵⁵¹ ¹⁵⁵² ¹⁵⁵³ ¹⁵⁵⁴ ¹⁵⁵⁵ ¹⁵⁵⁶ ¹⁵⁵⁷ ¹⁵⁵⁸ ¹⁵⁵⁹ ¹⁵⁶⁰ ¹⁵⁶¹ ¹⁵⁶² ¹⁵⁶³ ¹⁵⁶⁴ ¹⁵⁶⁵ ¹⁵⁶⁶ ¹⁵⁶⁷ ¹⁵⁶⁸ ¹⁵⁶⁹ ¹⁵⁷⁰ ¹⁵⁷¹ ¹⁵⁷² ¹⁵⁷³ ¹⁵⁷⁴ ¹⁵⁷⁵ ¹⁵⁷⁶ <

1492. and twenty-five thousand Crowns for the Arrears of the Pension due to Edward IV. But on the other hand, he suffered Bretagne to be lost, to the irreparable damage of England, since her Alliance with the Duke of Bretagne gave her an advantage over France which she could never after recover. Besides, the recovery of the money advanced for Bretagne, is to be ascribed rather to his good fortune than policy. He was solely indebted for it to the King of France's design upon the Kingdom of Naples, which induced him to purchase a Peace with England. Otherwise, Henry would have found it very difficult to recover his money, and who knows what might have happened, had he been forced to obtain it by dint of sword? But the advantages Charles reaped by this Peace were much more considerable. For the Pension of fifty thousand Livres paid a few years, and which he received with interest from Bretagne, he annexed that Duchy to the Crown of France, and deprived the English of their most considerable Ally.

I have dwelt the longer upon the circumstances of this Affair, because they perfectly discover the Genius and Character of Henry VII. This Monarch, ever greedy of money, having always his interest in view, found means to make an advantage whether of War or of Peace, and turn every thing to his profit. It was he that by his Policy, wholly bent to his own private interest, gave the turn we have seen to the Affairs of Bretagne.

The same day the Peace of Esmaples was signed, the Ambassadors of England and Scotland concluded at Caldstream a Truce, from the 3d of November this year, to the 30th of April 1494.

Henry having concluded a Peace with France according to his own Scheme, set out for London, where he arrived the 17th of December.

On the 5th of November the Archduke's Forces surprized Arras, which had been fifteen years in the hands of the French. Philip refusing to be included in the Peace of Esmaples, the War continued in Flanders till the next year.

In August this year 1492, Christopher Columbus failed the first time from Cadiz with King Ferdinand's License, in quest of the new World (1).

1493. Henry imagined he might for the future hope for a peaceable Reign. He saw among his Subjects no appearance of revolt. Not a Prince or Princess of the House of York was in condition to give him any disturbance. He kept the Earl of Warwick Prisoner in the Tower. Edward IV's Daughters were in his power, and there was no Lord of the York party of sufficient credit to raise Commotions in the Kingdom. On the other hand, he was in Peace or Truce with his Neighbours, and in the seven years and a half that he had been on the Throne, had by his Oeconomy heaped up such large Sums of money, as none of his Predecessors had ever been master of at once. And yet this State of prosperity was not capable of dimming his Enemies. Whilst he was wholly employed in the Affairs I have been relating, the Dukes Dowager of Burgundy was labouring to raise him troubles at home, so much the more dangerous as they were not suspected. This Princess was not ignorant how well disposed the English and Irish were to the House of York; and upon their affection the chiefly built her hopes of dethroning Henry. Though Lambert Simnel's Affair had miscarried, she did not ascribe the ill Success so much to the project it self, as to the managers. Besides, Henry was exposed to the hazard of a Battle, which he might have lost, and it was not impossible but he might be vanquished for the future, if he was in the same case. Thus he did not despair of wresting the Crown from the House of Lancaster, or rather of Tudor, after which, she reckoned it would be easy to restore the House of York.

Since Simnel's misfortune, she had never ceased to spread a report, either by herself or Emisaries, that Richard Duke of York, second Son of Edward IV., had escaped the Cruelty of his Uncle Richard III., and was still alive. This she did to prepare people to receive a second Fantom, who was to perfonate the young Prince her Nephew, as Lambert Simnel had perfonated the Earl of Warwick. To this end, she looked out carefully for young Lads of the Duke of York's age, fit for her purpose. At length she met with one, in whom she fancied to see all the qualities requisite to represent that Prince. His name was Perkin Warbeck, Son of [John Osbeck] a Jewish Convert of Tournay, who had long lived at London. Edward IV. having occasion to know this Jew, and receive some Service from him, was pleased to do him the honour to stand Godfather to one of his Children, and gave him the name of Peter, from whence was formed the diminutive Peterkin, or Perkin. Some years after, Osbeck being returned into Flanders, placed young Perkin with one of his relations at Antwerp, who kept him some time. This Boy was so handsome, and endowed with qualities so far above his birth, that many suspected Edward IV. to be his Father. And indeed it was something extraordinary, that Edward should stand Godfather to one of so mean Parentage. Be this as it will, Perkin going from Antwerp, lived in several Towns of Flanders, and shifted habitation so often, that when Henry afterwards would have traced him, in order to know the whole story of his Life, he found it very difficult. As Perkin generally conversed with the English settled in the Low-Countries, he was so perfect in the English Tongue, that he might easily be taken for an Englishman, especially as he had spent his Childhood at London.

This youth being mentioned to the Dukes of Bur- The Dukes of Burgundy, who were the first to take notice of him. gundy, he commanded him to be privately brought to her Palace, and finding him fit for her design, took care to instruct him, with respect to the Person he was to represent. Hence we may guess, Perkin must have been a youth of great Wit and Sense, to enter into the Dukes's designs, otherwise it would have been fruitless to give him Instructions. Be this as it will, he so often described Edward IV., his Queen, Prince Edward their eldest Son, and the Princesses their Daughters, that after several repetitions of her Lesson, he could talk very pertinently of the Court, of the King his pretended Father, at least as far as the Duke of York could be supposed to know. The natural way he had learnt of relating Circumstances fit for a Child's memory, and certain particulars of Edward's Court, made the Dukes believe, he would not fail to gain credit when he appeared in the World. Above all, she took care to make him perfect in what he was to frame, whilst in Sanctuary with the Queen, and when taken from thence by the contrivance of Richard III., and particularly in the manner of his escaping the hands of the Executioners, who were ordered to murder him. These were particulars so much the easier to be counterfeited, as there were but few people who could contradict them. Moreover, the taught him to assume the Air and Character of a well-bred Prince. She found the youth so apt a Scholar, that she was herself surprized at it. In a short time, Perkin so used himself to talk and act like a Prince, that one would have sworn he had been born so, and educated in a Palace.

It is not known when the Dukes of Burgundy took Perkin home to instruct him. But very likely, it was not long after the battle of Stoke, where the Earl of Lincoln, and Lambert Simnel were vanquished. However that be, the affair of Bretagne causing that Princess to think Henry would soon break with France, as himself would have had it believed, resolved Perkin should appear as Duke of York, so soon as the war was begun. Mean while, being very sensible, if he appeared first in Flanders, or in any Town in the Low-Countries, the world would not fail to suspect her, she sent him into Portugal (2), where he lived unknown for a year. At length, in 1492, the war between England and France seeming unavoidable, she dispatched orders to Perkin to repair into Ireland, where probably, she had already been tampering with several persons of note. Perkin instantly obeying, and arriving at Cork, called himself Duke of York, Son of Edward IV., in which he was countenanced by the Mayor, who, it is likely, was in the plot. A few days after, he writ to the Earls of Devon and Kildare, great Friends of the House of York, acquainting them with his arrival, and desiring them to come and join him.

Henry was then employed in his preparations for his Expedition into France. As the Dukes of Burgundy imagined he would depart early in the Spring, he expected, he would be embarked in the war with France, by the time Perkin appeared in Ireland, in which the was mistaken. The report that the Duke of York was come from Portugal into Ireland, caused no alteration in the King's measures. He believed it to be only a contrivance to divert him from his Enterprize. However, presently after he was told, the Duke of York who had appeared in Ireland, was gone into France, which made him very uneasy. And indeed the news was but too true. It happened some time before, that one Frien Secretary to the King for the French Tongue, had withdrawn from Court, and retired to Paris, where he was very well received. This Frien, who followed King Charles's Court, hearing the Duke of York was in Ireland, told that Monarch of it, intimating, he might make that affair turn to account.

1493. Whatever Charles thought of this Pretender, he really believed that, though he was an Impostor, he might be serviceable to him in making a Peace with Henry. In this belief, he sent Friar into Ireland, to invite the Pretender in his name to come to him, with assurance of his protection and aid to recover the Crown of his Ancestors. Perkin seeing himself invited by a Prince so great and so capable to assist him, departed without a moment's consideration. When he was arrived in France, he waited upon the King, who gave him a very glorious reception, treated him as Duke of York, lodged him in his Palace, and assigned him a Guard, under colour of doing him honor, but in reality to hinder the King of England from causing him to be seized. The Courtiers initiated their masters in striving to pay the same respects to Perkin, as they would have done to the Duke of York. Shortly after, above a hundred Englishmen, dissatisfied with the King, repaired to Paris with offers of their Service to the Pretender. But the honours Perkin received at the Court of France were of no long continuance. As soon as Charles was almost sure of a Peace, he dismissed him, for fear Henry, who had now demanded him, should make it one of the Articles of the Treaty. He was unwilling to be thought to surprize the young Man, in order to deliver him to his enemy; as on the other hand, he would not have the Peace miscarry for his sake.

Perkin thought himself very happy to be thus freed. He was afraid of worse usage, when he heard a Peace was treating between the two Kings. Having readily quitted the Court of France, he retired into Flanders to the Dukes of Burgundy, taking great care not to discover, he had ever seen her before. At the first Interview, Margaret acted her part extremely well. She treated him very roughly, and seemed much surprized, that in her presence he should dare to call himself Duke of York. She said publicly, that having been already imposed upon by a counterfeit Earl of Warwick, she should be more upon her Guard, and it would not be so easy to deceive her the second time. That therefore she advised him to retire, lest he incurred the punishment due to his boldness. Perkin seemed not at all troubled at these threats, and confessing he was in the right to doubt, persisted however in affirming, he was the Duke of York her Nephew. The Dukes feigning a desire to convince him of imposture before her whole Court, put certain questions to him, to which, he knew, he could make pertinent answers. Accordingly, he replied in so natural and unaffected a manner, that the Dukes seemed astonished. In short, they played their parts so well, that the Dukes pretending he could not resist such evident proofs, owned him for her Nephew, assigned him a Guard of thirty Halberdiers, and gave him the title of the white Rose, the Badge of the House of York. Perkin on his part, laboured to convince the world, he was the real Duke of York, by his natural way of relating the principal passages of his Life. If at any time his dimission out of France was objected to him, he answered with a Sigh, it was not very strange, a young Prince, persecuted by fortune, should be sacrificed to the Policy of two powerful Monarchs. That this very thing was a strong argument in his favour, since the Peace between Charles and Henry could be established only upon his ruin. What Perkin said, added to the Dukes's publick approbation, satisfied the whole Court, he was the true Duke of York, and from thence the rumour spread throughout all the Low-Countries, and at last over all Europe.

News being brought into England, about the beginning of the year 1493, that the Duke of York was in Flanders, and owned by the Dukes of Burgundy, it caused great motions in the Kingdom. The thing was presently credited by an infinite number of People, some of whom were dissatisfied with the King, and others greedy of novelty. Some blindly followed their Leaders, and others, whose Fortunes were desperate, wished for a change in the Government. The King was not generally beloved. The loss of Bretagne; his late Peace with the King of France; the uncivil usage the Queen and the whole House of York had received, and daily did receive at his hands; and lastly, his unnecessary Taxes, were too apt to make the people with the report to be true.

The King was surprized to see with what greediness the news was received. It convinced him of his great danger from the Yorkists, and their constant readiness to embrace all opportunities to ruin him if it was possible. He appeared however unconcerned, lest his fears should encourage his enemies. So, continuing to act as usual, he waited till they more plainly discovered their designs.

In the beginning of March, Henry sent (1) the Order of the Garter to Alphonso Duke of Calabria, eldest Son of Ferdinand King of Naples. Alphonso had been extremely desirous of this Honour, to intimate to the Princes of Italy, that he had in the King of England a Protector who would not suffer him to be oppressed. He would have thereby induced them to league with the King his Father, against Charles VIII, who was going to undertake the conquest of the Kingdom of Naples.

A few days after, Henry concluded at London a Treaty of perpetual peace and amity with Ferdinand and Isabella, King and Queen of Castile and Aragon. This Alliance, which was a reciprocal engagement of mutual assistance upon all occasions, was particular in that it extended not to all the Kings of England and Spain without distinction, but only to all their successors descended from them (2). In this Treaty, the marriage articles between Prince Arthur and Catherine, Daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, were confirmed and renewed (3).

Mean while, the King's enemies, not content with countenancing the report concerning the Duke of York, were now labouring to form a conspiracy to dethrone him. His covetous temper had alienated several of the firmest friends to his person and the House of Lancaster. William Stanley Lord Chamberlain, Brother of the Earl of Derby, John Ratcliff Lord Fitz-Walter, Sir Robert Clifford, Sir Simon Monifort, Sir Thomas Thwaites, William Barley, were the chief heads of this conspiracy. The Lord Chamberlain had greatly contributed to his victory of Bosworth, by declaring for him in so critical a minute. The King owned it, but thought him well rewarded with the spoils of Bosworth Field, and the office of Lord Chamberlain. But Stanley thinking this too mean a recompence, was not satisfied. Sir Robert Clifford was Son of him that murdered the young Earl of Rutland, Brother of Edward IV, at the Battle of Wakefield; and afterwards lost his life in fighting for the House of Lancaster. Probably, Henry had forgot the constant attachment of that family to his House, and neglected to give him a share in his favors. Clifford and Barley were deputed by the conspirators to go into Flanders, and concert measures with the Dukes of Burgundy and the pretended Duke of York, for the accomplishment of their designs. The Dukes gave them a very civil reception, deeming it a good omen, that professed enemies of her House should be the first to offer their service. Shortly after their arrival, Clifford writ to his friends in England, that the Duke of York, Son of Edward IV, was in Flanders, and that he knew him perfectly well. This news inflamed the conspirators, and from that time, York is they spared no pains to gain adherents to the pretended Duke of York.

Whilst the King's enemies were labouring to create in him fresh troubles, he himself was no less intent upon devising means to prevent the impending storm (4). His principal business was to undeceive the people, and, to succeed, there was occasion for two sorts of proofs. First, it was necessary to shew that the Duke of York was dead; in the second place, that though he were alive, the person that borrowed his name was a counterfeit.

To prove the Duke of York was not living, it was necessary to produce the testimonies of those who had taken away his life, or seen him dead, and who were but four in all; namely, Sir James Tyrrel, ordered by Richard III. to put that Prince to death; John Dighton, employed by Tyrrel to commit the fact; Miles Forst his servant, who assisted him, and the Priest who buried the two Princes. Of these four persons, the Priest and Forst were dead, and there remained only Tyrrel and Dighton. These were apprehended by the King's order and sent to Prison. Then, after a private examination, it was given out, that they agreed in their depositions; namely that Dighton and Forst smothered the two Princes in their Bed; and shewed their dead Bodies to Tyrrel, and that the Priest afterwards buried them under a stair-case. That soon after, Richard ordered them to be removed elsewhere, by the same Priest who was since dead, without discovering where he had laid them. It is likely however, that Tyrrel's deposition was not so favorable for the King's purpose as Dighton's, since he was detained in Prison, whereas Dighton was released, probably, that he might divulge his own evidence.

The publishing of these testimonies produced not the 1493. effect the King expected. For, what proof could a confession form, taken at a private examination, and published by him whose interest it was to make it appear for his advantage? In the next place, the removal of the Bodies from the place where they were first interred, to another unknown, gave cause for strong suspicions. Had it not been for this removal, nothing would have been more easy than to prove the death of the two Princes, since the Bodies would have been still found under the Stair-case. So, people imagined, the King, wanting so natural a proof, had invented this removal, that his not making use of so convincing a proof might not be thought strange. Besides, the testimony of two villains who confessed themselves guilty of so black a crime, and whose evidence was so advantageous to the King, could not be of any great weight. Accordingly, the King, finding this method insufficient to undeceive the people, applied himself chiefly to discover who this impostor was, that pretended to be the Duke of York.

To succeed in this design, he found no better way than to bribe several persons, who repaired to the counterfeit Duke, under colour of offering him their service. He charged them to use all their endeavours to know who and whence he was, and to trace him from his birth to the day he came to the Duches of Burgundy. At the same time, he ordered them to make strict inquiry after his correspondents in England, and observe narrowly every thing that passed about him. Especially he enjoined some of the discreetest, to spare nothing to gain Sir Robert Clifford, much suspecting him to be concerned in the secret. It is said, that in order to make discoveries, he bribed the servants, and even the very confessors of the great Men he suspected. Moreover, to procure his spies in Flanders the greater credit, he used to have them pronounced excommunicate every Sunday at St. Paul's, by virtue of Pope Innocent VIII's Bull. He was so well served by these spies, that, in short, he came to know, the pretended Duke of York was no other than Perkin Warbeck. He had perfect information of his birth, life, actions, profession, and of all the places he had lived at from his Childhood; which was instantly divulged throughout the whole Kingdom. Mean while, as the particulars were published by the King, the principal party concerned, the generality of People did not think themselves obliged to believe him upon his bare word. Their prejudice made them require more convincing Proofs.

Whilst the King's spies were acting in Flanders and England, he had two affairs upon his hands from which he wanted to be disengaged, in case any troubles should arise in the Kingdom on account of the pretended Duke of York. The first was, to make Peace with Scotland; the second, to get the Peace of Estaples confirmed by the Pope, according to agreement with the King of France. For this purpose, he sent Ambassadors to Edinburgh and Rome. The former concluded with King James a Truce from April the 30th 1494, to that day seven years 1501, upon the same terms with that of Caldecream, which expired the day this was to commence. It appears by the Ambassadors instructions, that he desired to conclude a marriage between the King of Scotland and Catherine Daughter of the Countess of Wiltshire, and Grand-daughter of the Duke of Somerset. But this marriage was not proposed, or at least the Negotiation did not succeed (1).

As to the affair of Rome, the Ambassadors presented to Pope Alexander VI, a petition for a Bull of excommunication against whichever of the two Kings should not observe the Treaty of Estaples. The Pope owned it to be one of the articles of the Treaty, and answered, he was ready to grant such a Bull, provided the King of France did not oppose it; an instrument whereof he ordered to be given to the Ambassadors.

The Emperor Frederick dying in August this year, Maximilian his Son, King of the Romans, ascended the imperial Throne in his room.

The 21st of the same month, John Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury, was made Cardinal of St. Anastasius.

Henry having had perfect information of every thing relating to Perkin Warbeck, sent Ambassadors (2) to Archduke Philip to desire him to deliver him up. He represented, "That it was contrary to the law of Nations, and the alliance they had made together, to protect a counterfeit, who fought to rob him of the Crown by an evident imposture. That he was informed of all the circumstances of Perkin's life from his cradle, and offered to produce authentic proofs of the cheat, as well as of the death of the Duke of York, whose name Warbeck borrowed. That Perkin being only a theatrical King formed by the Duches of Burgundy, he hoped the Archduke would not scruple to deliver him into his hands." Philip being still a minor, his Council told the Ambassadors, "That the Archduke's intention was, always to preserve a good understanding with the King of England, and therefore would give no manner of assistance to the pretended Duke of York. But the Duches of Burgundy being Sovereign in the lands of her Dowry, the Archduke could not meddle with her affairs, or hinder her from doing what she thought fit."

Philip believed he had then the less reason to regard the King of England, as he had made a Peace with Charles VIII, by a Treaty concluded at Senlis the 23d of May, Charles had referred to the Archduke his Sister Margaret, and Philip with the Earldoms of Artois and Burgundy; but kept some Towns on promise to deliver them as soon as Philip was of age.

The Ambassadors brought Philip's answer to the King, and withal told him, there was collusion between him and the Duches of Burgundy. Henry was so provoked at this proceeding, that he broke off all commerce with the Archduke, and banished all Flemings out of his Kingdom (3). The Archduke did the like by the English who were in Flanders. But the animosity between these two Princes went no farther, each fearing he might one day want the other's assistance.

Mean while, Henry having at length gained Sir Robert Clifford, who was intrusted with Warbeck's and the Duches of Burgundy's secrets, had exact information of their correspondents in England. As it could not be dangerous to let the evil increase, he resolved to apply proper remedies. For that purpose, he caused to be arrested in one day, and almost at the same instant, John Ratcliff Lord Fitz-Walter, Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwaite, William D'Aubrey, Robert Ratcliff, Thomas Cressner, and Thomas Astwood. All these were convicted and condemned for High-Treason, in adhering and promising aid to Perkin. The Lord Fitz-Walter was sent Prisoner to Calais with some hope of obtaining his pardon. But his impatience causing him to attempt to make his escape, he was discovered and beheaded. Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Robert Ratcliff, and William D'Aubrey were executed immediately after their condemnation. The rest were pardoned, and those that were apprehended upon the same account, among whom were certain Dominican Friars, and [William Werfley] Dean of St. Paul's, were released. Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain, whether he was not yet informed against, or the King had a mind to stay for stronger proofs to convict him, was not touched at that time.

On the 1st of November, Henry writ to the King of France, desiring to be included in the Peace of Senlis, according to the Tenor of the Treaty. The 17th of the same month, he notified to him the same thing from Ferdinand King of Naples, and Alphons Duke of Calabria his Son, who were expressly included in the Peace of Senlis, on the part of the Emperor and Archduke. But however King Charles desisted not from his project of conquering Naples.

England was very quiet during the year 1494. Perkin Warbeck still remained in Flanders without offering to stir, the execution of his adherents convincing him, the King knew more of his affairs than he imagined. Mean while, Henry laboured underhand to inform himself more and more concerning the circumstances of the conspiracy, and what the Duches of Burgundy was contriving in England and elsewhere. In this Sir Robert Clifford whom he had gained, was very servicable. He learnt by his means, that Perkin had still some dependence in Ireland, and had writ to the Earls of Desmond and Kildare, when he landed there from Portugal. This discovery made him resolve to take care of the affairs of that Island, which had been hitherto much neglected. To that end, he made Henry his second Son, then but two years old, Lieutenant or Governor of Ireland; but appointed for Deputy, Sir Edward Poyning, a Man versed in affairs, and employed in several Embassies. He gave him a very extensive power as well over the militia, as the civil Government, that he might put the Island upon a good foot (4).

Poyning, upon his arrival in Ireland, made strict enquiry after those that were suspected of disaffection to the 1494. King particularly he vigorously attacked the Earls of Desmond and Kildare (1). The first took care of himself, and kept out of the reach of the Lord-Deputy: but the Earl of Kildare was sent Prisoner into England, from whence he was quickly sent back by the King with marks of esteem and good-will. As he dreamed first troubles in Ireland, where a Rebellion in his circumstances would have been very incommensurable, he thought he should prevent them by acts of Grace, rather than severity; and therefore sent a Commissioner (2) with a general Pardon in form, as well for the Earl of Desmond, as for all the Irish Rebels, to stifle if possible all the seeds of Rebellion in the Island, where the House of York had but too many friends.

Whilst Poyning's was in Ireland, he held a Parliament famous for the Statutes enacted to the advantage of the Crown of England, and of the English settled in the Island. One of these Statutes, still called Poyning's Law, ran, that the Parliament of Ireland should not be assembled before the Lord Lieutenant and Council had acquainted the King with the reasons, and obtained the Royal Licence under the Great Seal. It was also enacted, that all the Statutes of England concerning the publick, should be observed in Ireland. These two Statutes are still in force to this day (3).

Though Henry had given several proofs of his self-interested and covetous Temper, they might be coloured with some pretence, because the secret Springs of his Policy were not yet fully known. But it was not the same with regard to his proceedings this year, which plainly discovered his nature. The pretence of foreign Affairs failing him, he extorted large Sums from private persons, by forfeitures upon penal Laws, on purpose to fill his Coffers. This proceeding was the more displeasing to the People, as they easily perceived it flowed from his natural disposition, since he was not obliged by any necessity to use such extraordinary methods. He was in Peace with all the Princes of Europe. He had drawn from the Parliament two very considerable Subsidies, of which he had not expended a fourth part, and even that was repaid him with interest. Moreover, besides divers Confiscations, he received every year fifty thousand Livres of the King of France. All this, added to the usual Revenues of the Crown, which were no less than in the foregoing Reigns, seemed to enable him to ease, instead of oppressing his Subjects with frivolous accusations to drain their Purfes. The first he attacked in this manner was Sir William Capel Alderman of London, who was fined two thousand seven hundred pounds, and forced to compound with the King for sixteen hundred. The Archbishop of Canterbury was taxed with being the Contriver of these methods to procure the King money. But whether Henry's Avarice daily increased, or the Ministers who succeeded that Prelate were still less scrupulous than he, People had but too much reason to lament him after his death.

Towards the end of this year, Henry gave a fresh instance of his desire of money, which proved very injurious to his good name, especially as he endeavoured to cover it with the veil of justice. By secret advices from Sir Robert Clifford he was informed, Sir William Stanley, Lord Chamberlain, was one of Perkin Warbeck's Adherents. Tho' that Lord had done him the greatest Service imaginable, since he had procured him the Victory which raised him to the Throne, he resolved to sacrifice him to his Avarice, under colour of punishing his Crime. I say, to his Avarice, and not to Justice or Revenge. For if we may judge by his usual Conduct, with regard to the State-Criminals, of whom there was nothing to be got, he would, doubtless, have pardoned Stanley, if the desire of confiscating his Estate, had not rendered him inexorable.

To attain his ends, he ordered Clifford, who was still in Flanders, to repair privately into England. When he heard the Informer was arrived, he removed to the Tower (4), that the great ones who should be accused, might be arrested more conveniently, and without noise. Clifford being come to London without discovering himself, the King assembled the Council (5) in the Tower, and sent for Sir Robert, who falling down at his feet, craved his pardon, offering to declare whatever he knew of the Conspiracy. The King immediately pardoned him, but on express condition, he would conceal nothing of what was come to his knowledge. Whereupon Clifford impeached several persons, and among the rest the Lord Chamberlain. The King seeming extremely surprized, bid him take care what he said, since his Life lay at stake in case the Accusation was groundless. Clifford persisting, the Lord Chamberlain was presently apprehended. Next day he was examined by the Council, where he confessed enough to condemn him. The great Service he had done the King and the Interest of the Earl of Derby his Brother, made him hope he should not be treated with rigour. But two things rendered his Crime unpardonable. The first was his immense riches, which promised the King a plentiful Confiscation (6). The second, that he Hall. Bacon. speaking of Perkin Warbeck, if he were sure that Stow. young Man were King Edward's Son, he would never bear arms against him. This was wounding the King in the most sensible part, since he seemed to acknowledge, the House of York had a better Title than the House of Lancaster. Had he been guilty only of this Crime, it is a question, whether the Judges would have sentenced him to die, but it is likely, he was convicted of acting more directly against the King, and holding Intelligence with Warbeck, and the Dukes of Burgundy. All the favour he could obtain, was a delay of some weeks, to prepare for death, which he suffered not till the beginning of the next year (7). The King's Severity on this occasion seemed excessive. All the World imagined he would pardon a Lord to whom he was so much obliged, and who had even enabled him to exercise Acts of Mercy, by procuring him the Crown. Besides, he was Brother to the Earl of Derby, a zealous Servant, and Father-in-law of the King.

The execution of the Lord Chamberlain terrified the whole Kingdom. He was condemned for a Crime of which few Englishmen were innocent, namely, for preferring the Title of York, to that of Lancaster. But what caused still greater dread, was that the King was perceived to have had Spies about the Lord Chamberlain to observe his Conduct, which might be every Man's case. The great Men durst not speak their thoughts to one another, for fear those whom they counted their best Friends, were the King's Spies. But this restraint was in some measure made up, by swarms of Libels against the Judges, the Council, and the King himself. This License to dispense the King, that he ordered five persons, convicted of dispersing these Libels, to be executed.

Richard Fox, Bishop of Bath and Wells, one of the King's Favorites, was translated this year to the See of Durham.

It was likewise this year, that Henry the King's second Son, two years old, was created Duke of York (8).

Though there was a Truce concluded with Scotland the 30th of April 1501, there still remained some differences between the English and Scots, concerning certain English Lands on the Borders of the two Kingdoms, and the Fishery of the River Eske. Henry always dreaming of Insurrection in the Kingdom, was extremely desirous to have no Contests with his Neighbours. For this reason, he had in May this year, moved, that the differences between England and Scotland might be adjusted. King James seeming to desire the same thing, they both sent Ambassadors to Calcutream, to agree upon some Expedient. Richard Fox was at the head of the English Embassy (9). But with all his Address, he could not end an affair, which in itself seemed not very difficult. This caused Henry to suspect, that the King of Scotland reserved it for an occasion of quarrel, and to order the Earl of Surrey to be upon his guard in the North.

Charles VIII undertook this year the long meditated Conquest of the Kingdom of Naples. This affair is so well known, it would be needless to relate the particulars. It is necessary, however, briefly to mention the rise and principal events.

The Posterity of Charles of Anjou, first King of Sicily and of the House of France, was divided into two Branches, whereof one reigned in Naples, the other in Hungary.

1494. After sundry Revolutions, the Crown of Naples fell at length to Joan the first of that name. But in 1380 Charles de Durazzo, of the Branch of Hungary, pretending to the same Crown, and repairing into Italy, attacked Queen Joan, who finding herself pressed by this Enemy, adopted Lewis I. Duke of Anjou, Uncle of Charles VI. King of France. From that time there was a continual War between the two Houses of Anjou. At last, Charles de Durazzo remained in possession of Naples, and was succeeded by Ladislaus his Son, who dying in 1414, left the Crown of Naples to Joan II. his Sister. Mean time, Lewis I. Duke of Anjou, and Lewis II. his Son, always stiled themselves Kings of Sicily, and preserved their pretensions to Sicily on this side the Pharo, or the Kingdom of Naples. Lewis II., who died in 1417, left three Sons, namely, Lewis III., René, and Charles.

In 1421, Lewis III. led an army into Naples to dethrone Joan II. who, for support, adopted Alphonso King of Aragon. Alphonso arriving in the Kingdom of Naples, forced Lewis III. to quit the Country, and retire into France. Shortly after, upon some quarrel between Joan and Alphonso, Joan revoking the adoption of Alphonso, adopted the same Lewis of Anjou, who would have deprived her of the Crown, and declared him her presumptive Heir and Successor; but Lewis died without Issue in 1431. Joan departed this Life the next year, having made a Will in favour of René of Anjou, Brother of Lewis III.

René made some attempts to take possession of the Kingdom of Naples, but to no purpose. Alphonso King of Aragon kept the Crown till he died in 1458. He left the Kingdom of Aragon to John his lawful Son, and that of Naples to Ferdinand his Bastard.

In 1474 René made a Will, and appointed for his Heir Charles Earl of Main his Nephew, Son of Charles his younger Brother, to the prejudice of Violante his Daughter Duchess of Lorraine, and René Duke of Lorraine his Grandson.

Charles Earl of Main, Nephew and Heir of King René, died in 1481, leaving Lewis XI. King of France, his sole Heir. By virtue of which Will, Charles VIII. Son of Lewis XI. pretended, the Kingdom of Naples was fallen to him.

If what has been said be never so little considered, it will doubtless be perceived, that Charles's title to the Kingdom of Naples was very disputable. To decide this case in a judicial way, it would have been necessary to examine two points of equal Importance in this affair. First, whether Joan II. had power to revoke the adoption of Alphonso King of Aragon, and to adopt Lewis of Anjou in his room. It is true, the French Historians pretend, Alphonso would have dethroned his Benefactress, and upon that supposition, the reason of the revocation seems just. But the Aragonians grant not the fact. They ascribe it to Joan's Levity, who was inconstant and capricious. In the next place, supposing the House of Anjou's Title better than the House of Aragon's, this second point must have been examined, whether King René could set aside Violante his Daughter and her Heirs, and give the Kingdom of Naples to Charles Earl of Main his Nephew. It could not be alleged in favour of this Will, that the Kingdom of Naples was a masculine Fief, since the House of Anjou's Title was derived from a Daughter. So Charles VIII. could pretend to that Kingdom, only upon supposition, that the Laws decided these two points in his favour, which was very doubtful, not to say worse. Besides, the House of Aragon had another Title founded upon a sixty years possession. But what rendered this affair very intricate was, that the Popes, as Sovereign Lords of Naples, seemed to have determined it in favour of the House of Anjou, by investing the Princes of that House with that Kingdom.

But it was not so much his Title to the Kingdom of Naples, that induced Charles VIII. to this Conquest, as the juncture of time, and the situation of the affairs of Italy. Ferdinand King of Naples had two Sons; namely, Alphonso who bore the Title of Duke of Calabria, and Frederic. Alphonso had a Son called Ferdinand, after his Grandfather. These Aragonian Princes were not beloved in Naples, nor in the rest of Italy. Besides, old King Ferdinand had banished the Prince of Salerno, with all the other Heads of the Angevin Faction. And these Exiles it was that excited Charles to the Conquest of Naples. But this alone would not have sufficed to determine him to this undertaking, had he not been encouraged by Ludovico Sforza, Uncle of the Duke of Milan. The occasion was this:

The Duchy of Milan was passed from the Family of Vicenti, to that of Sforza; Philippo Maria Vicenti, last Duke of that House, having adopted Francis Sforza, who had married Blanch his only Daughter.

Francisco Sforza, becoming Duke of Milan after the death of his Father-in-law, died in 1466, leaving two Sons, Galeazzo, who succeeded him, and Ludovico, surnamed the Black. Galeazzo being assassinated, John Galeazzo his Son succeeded him, under the Guardianship of his Mother, a Woman infamous for her Lewdness, and of Ludovico his Uncle. Some time after, the young Duke married Isabella, Daughter of Alphonso Duke of Calabria, eldest Son of Ferdinand King of Naples. John Galeazzo being a Prince of a narrow Genius, Ludovico his Uncle engrossed the whole power, leaving to his Nephew only the bare Title of Duke, without his being much concerned. But Isabella his Duchess, not bearing to see the Duke her Spouse without any Authority, complained to the Duke of Calabria her Father of this ill usage. Shortly after, the Duke persuaded Ferdinand his Father to proclaim War against Ludovico, to compel him to resign the Government to his Nephew.

To avoid this War it was that Ludovico excited Charles VIII. to undertake the Conquest of Naples, by putting him in hopes, he would assist him with all his Forces. He had also a further design to make use of Charles's aid, to become master of the Duchy of Milan, and dispossess John Galeazzo his Nephew. He had now taken some private measures to that end with the Emperor Maximilian, to whom he had given Blanch his Niece in Marriage, with a Dowry of four hundred thousand Crowns, and Maximilian had privately invested him with the Duchy of Milan for him and his Heirs.

Upon the rumour of Charles VIII's preparations for the Conquest of Naples, old King Ferdinand offered him a yearly Tribute of fifty thousand Crowns; but the offer was rejected. Ferdinand died a little before Charles's Expedition, and was succeeded by Alphonso his eldest Son.

The war of Naples seems at first to be entirely foreign to the History of England. However, as it was the source and origin of many great Events in Europe, in the next Century, I thought it not improper to shew the occasion, and for the same reason it is necessary to relate the principal Events.

Charles VIII. departed from Paris in July 1494, and came to Asti in Piedmont, where he fell sick of the Small-Pox. This distemper detaining him at Asti, he could not go from thence till the 6th of October, to Turin, where he was forced to borrow the Duchesse of Savoy's Jewels, so ill provided was he of Money for an Enterprize of that consequence. Ludovico Sforza made haste to meet him, and accompanied him to Pavia, where they found Duke John Galeazzo out of order, upon eating something that his Uncle Ludovico had caused to be given him. When they came to Placentia they heard of John Galeazzo's death. Then Ludovico left the King, to go and take possession of the Duchy of Milan, though the late Duke his Nephew had left a Son. Ludovico having obtained what he wanted, had not the same attachment for the King of France as before. On the contrary, he thought only how to drive him out of Italy, by a League of which he was the principal promoter.

Mean while, Charles pursuing his march, entered the State of Florence, and compelled Peter de Medicis the Duke, to deliver him four of his best Towns, and lend him Money. He made his Entry into the City of Florence the 17th of November, and published a Manifesto concerning the war of Naples. Then he took the rout to Rome, and all the places in the Ecclesiastical State readily brought him their Keys. Alexander VI. upon the King's approach, desired Prince Ferdinand, Son of the King of Naples, to depart from Rome, where he was received some time before. On the other hand, Frederic Brother of Alphonso, who was upon the Coast of Genoa with a Fleet, came to Naples, where all was in the utmost Conternation. Thus Charles having passed through Italy without the least opposition, entered Rome the 28th of December, whilst the Pope in a fright shut himself up in the Castle of Angelo for the Security of his person. It is time now to return to the affairs of England.

Henry perceiving the Negotiation with Scotland proceeded very slowly, without his being able to discover any visible reason, was apprehensive that King James would take occasion from their differences about the Fishery of the River Eike, to break the Truce. So, not to be surprized, he sent the Earl of Surrey orders to levy Troops for the defence of the North, against the attempts of the Scots and Irish. These attempts which he pretended to fear, were only an excuse to put himself in a State of defence, in case the King of Scotland should attack him.

Shortly after, he made the Duke of York his second Son President of the northern Marches, though he was but three years old. He had made him last year Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and by that means kept in his own Coffers the Salaries of these two Posts, which must have been given to two several Lords. Never Prince better understood the Art of husbanding his Money, and making every thing turn to his profit.

Act. Pub.

1495. The Duches of York, Mother of Edward IV, and Richard III, died this year in a very advanced Age (1). In July, Alexander VI sent into England a Bull, empowering all the Bishops of the Kingdom to absolve the Rebels, which by Innocent VIII's Bull was granted the Archbishop of Canterbury alone.

Hitherto Perkin Warbeck had not ventured to make any attempt in England, knowing that the King was informed of all his Correspondents. But as the Duches of Burgundy could not think, of relinquishing her hopes of gaining more advantage by the Idol formed by herself, she resolved at length to send him into England. She judged it necessary to found the People's Affection for the House of York, without waiting any longer for the Assistance of the great Men, who being narrowly watched were very cautious. Besides, she perceived, if the people seemed ready to rise, there would be no want of great Men to support and conduct them. Wherefore, she gave orders to draw together some Forces and Ships, and caused Perkin Warbeck to embark, and make a descent in the County of Kent. Mean while, Henry knowing nothing of these preparations in Flanders, resolved to go in progress to Yorkshire (2) to visit the Countess his Mother, which seemed to be a Juncture very favorable to Perkin's design. But as the projected descent miscarried, it was not doubted, that the King being informed of the pretended Duke of York's Intent, had taken that Journey on purpose to draw him into the Snare, so perwaded were people that Policy governed all his Actions.

Perkin, pursuant to the Duches of Burgundy's directions, arrived upon the Coast of Kent (3), near Sandwich, and landed some Men to found the Inclination of the Inhabitants. These Troops made great boasts of the powerful Armament the Duke of York had made in Flanders, pretending the Ships in sight were but a small part of the Fleet which would soon appear. But the people perceiving, these Men were almost all Foreigners, instead of joining them, advised with the Gentlemen of the County to know how they were to behave. And it was resolved, they should feign to be ready to assist Perkin, in order to allure him to land and take him prisoner. Pursuant to this resolution, the people took arms and appeared on the Coast, making signs to invite Perkin and his Men to land. But Perkin and his Counsellor Prion suspecting the artifice, kept on board, expecting the return of some of their people, to inform them of what passed on shore. At last, the Kentishmen finding they could draw in no more, fell upon those that were already landed, and cut them in pieces, except about a hundred and fifty, who being taken alive, were all hanged by the King's order. Perkin being Eye-witness of his people's misfortune, weighed Anchor and returned into Flanders. Henry, who was then on his progress, hearing of the descent, was about to turn back towards Kent (4), but presently after receiving news of what had passed, he continued his Journey (4), and spent some time with the Countess his Mother, at the Earl of Derby's House (5). His intent was thereby to make a sort of excuse to that Lord for putting his Brother to death, and give him withal, a proof of the continuance of his favour.

The 13th of October the King called a Parliament, where it was enacted, That no person should be impeached or attainted for assisting the King for the time being. It is easy to see, the design of this Act was to hinder a close examination of the King's title to the Crown, since let what would be the consequence, those that served him would be always safe (6). Indeed, the precedent he had himself given, in causing those to be condemned that bore arms for Richard III, must have made his friends apprehensive of being in the same case, if the like Revolution should happen. But the Clause added in the body of the Statute, that if for the future, any Act of Attainder should pass against such as assisted the King for the time being, it should be of no force; this Clause I say, was void and of no effect. For how could an Act of this kind, limit the power of a future, Parliament, and cause an Act, in its nature revocable, not to be so? Mean while, this Statute, which seemed to be made solely for the people's safety, but was however, only for the King's Security, discovered Henry's unaltness and thiercinty concerning his title.

There was also an Act passed to oblige those who had not paid their quota of the Benevolence, to pay the Arrears by such a time. This Act brought in large Sums to the King, the Arrears of this Tax being very considerable, because the war with France not having lasted any time, many persons had declined to pay either in full or in part. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the Archbishop of Canterbury was indebted fifteen hundred Pounds Sterling (7).

Whilst the Parliament was yet assembled, the King received advice, that Perkin Warbeck was landed in Ireland. As this could not be but with some ill design, he gave order that the Coasts should be strictly guarded, to be ready to oppose a descent wherever it was made. It was but too true, that the Duches of Burgundy had sent Perkin into Ireland to raise a Rebellion, and to that end, she had privately treated with the King of Scotland, who, it is likely, had promised to aid him. The common opinion is, that the Emperor, the Archduke Philip, and the King of France, were likewise in the plot: The two first, in revenge of Henry's prohibition to his Subjects of all Commerce with the Low-Countries, and the other, to hinder his entering into a League that was forming in Italy, to which he was strongly solicited. Be this as it will, very probably, James, in promising to espouse the Interests of the pretended Duke of York, had been led thereto by some private view, or by the Solicitation of some other Prince.

Mean while, since Poynings had been in Ireland, the affairs of that Island were quite altered. So, Perkin not finding the Country inclined to favour his designs, departed for Scotland, where in all appearance, he knew he should be welcome. When he came to Edinburgh, he demanded an Audience of the King, by the name of the Duke of York. James feigning an extreme surprize, gave him a solemn reception in the presence of the whole Court. Perkin made a long Speech, recounting his pretended Adventures, and how he escaped the Cruelty of Richard III. Then, he inveighed against Henry Tudor, who had usurped the Crown of England, and unjustly detained it from the lawful Heirs of Edward IV. He enlarged upon the methods he had used to endeavour to recover his Kingdom. He concluded with saying, that sundry Accidents having prevented him from succeeding, he was come to put himself under his Protection, in hopes that with the assistance of so generous a Prince, he should expel the Usurper, and ascend the Throne of his Ancestors. That then he should always regard him as a Brother, and never miss an opportunity of showing his gratitude.

James seemed to be moved with Perkin's misfortunes, and told him, whoever he was, he should not repent of putting himself into his hands. However, he pretended still to have some doubt, to show it was upon mature examination that he was convinced of the truth. Shortly after, he publicly owned him for Duke of York, and gave him in marriage, Catherine Gordon Daughter of the Earl of Huntly, one of the handomest and most accomplished Ladies in Scotland.

Henry whether he had received private notice of what was plotting against him, or it was a pure effect of his foresight, ardently wished to live in good understanding with the King of Scotland. To that end, he had empowered his Ambassadors (8), who were to repair to Calcut, to treat of the marriage of Margaret his eldest Daughter with that Prince. This marriage was indeed accomplished some years after; but, in all likelihood, was not mentioned in this congress, the Ambassadors of England having doubtless perceived that such a proposal would be unseasonable.

The 28th of January 1495, Charles VIII departed from Rome, after receiving the strongest Towns of the Kingdom of Naples.

(6) My Lord Bacon observes, that though this Law seemed to aim more at the People's Safety than the King's, yet did it take off from his Party that great Tye and Spur of Necessity, to fight and go Victors out of the Field, considering their Lives and Fortunes were in safety, whether they stood or run away.

(7) The other remarkable Statutes enacted in this Parliament were these: 1. That Vagabonds, idle, and suspected Persons, shall be set in the Stocks three days and three nights, and have no other Substance but Bread and Water, and then shall be put out of the Town. And whosoever shall give such persons more, shall forfeit Twelvepence. This Act was afterwards explained, 39 Elizab. 2. That poor Persons, who are not able to sue according to the Laws of the Land, for the redress of Injuries and Wrongs to them done, shall be admitted in Forma Pauperis, without paying Fees to Counsellors, Attorneys, or Clerks. 3. That no manner of Person shall carry, or feed any Horse or Mare, above the value of six Shillings and Eightpence, out of the Realm, upon pain of forfeiting the same; except it is for their own use. 4. That no Person shall make, or put to sale any Feather-bed, Bolsters, or Pillows, but what are stuffed with dry pulled Feathers, or clean Down; and not with fard Feathers, or Feen-down. ecclesiastical State, with Cardinal Caspar Borgia natural Son of Pope Alexander VI in Hostage. Whilst he was upon the march, the Ambassador of Ferdinand King of Spain told him from his master, that when he promised not to molest him in the conquest of Naples, he did not mean that this conquest was to extend to all Italy. That notwithstanding, he saw him in possession of Florence, Pisa, and all the Papal Dominions. That therefore he declared, he did not think himself bound to the observance of their Treaty, and accordingly the Ambassador tore it in pieces before his face. Charles who was failing with a prosperous gale, made a jest of these threats, and pursued his march.

Mean while Alphonse, the new King of Naples, finding himself attacked by a powerful King who was now upon the borders of his Dominions, was entirely discouraged. As he knew he was not beloved by his Subjects, he resigned his Crown to Ferdinand his Son, and retired to a Monastery, where he died this very year. The new King willing to defend his Kingdom, advanced towards the frontiers to endeavour to stop the King of France. But he saw himself suddenly deserted by his own Troops. In this extremity he would have retired to Naples, but found the Gates shut. In short, he was forced to seek a retreat in the little Isle of Ischia, having first garrisoned the Castles of his Metropolis, where he could enter without passing through the City.

In the mean time, Charles still continued his march. Trivulzio a Milanese, who was in the service of the King of Naples, having surrendered Capua, all the rest of the Towns sent him Deputies with offers of submission. At last, he entered Naples the 22d of February, and within few days became master of the Castles.

Such a torrent of success blinded the young Monarch and his Council, that they knew not how to take any just measures for the preservation of this Conquest. By degrees the Towns that had submitted, returned to their Sovereign's Army, which was not very numerous, being unable to furnish Garrisons every where. Besides, the French made themselves so odious to the people of Naples, that they soon repented of receiving them.

But what most embroiled the Conqueror's affairs, was a League formed against him by the Pope, the Emperor, the King of Spain, the Archduke, the King of Naples, Ludovico Sforza new Duke of Milan, and the Republic of Venice. This League, which was for twenty-five years, was signed the 25th of March 1495, and at the same time the Confederates began to assemble their Forces.

Charles found then, it was time to think of his return. But he was resolved first to make a triumphant entry into Naples, from whence he departed the 20th of May in order for France, leaving but few Troops to defend his Conquest. But the Allies did not intend to suffer him to retire thus peaceably. They expected him upon his rout, with an Army of forty thousand Men, and posted themselves at Fornova to oppose his passage. Though Charles was very inferior in number of Troops (1), he was determined to give them Battle, being sensible that he must either conquer or perish. The Battle was fought on the 6th of July, and the success was favorable to the King of France, who defeated that formidable Army and came to Asti the 15th of the same month (2).

Whilst he was retiring through Italy, Naples submitted again to Ferdinand, and almost all the rest of the Towns that were still in the French interest followed her example. The Duke of Montpensier, left by Charles at Naples with a few Troops, retired to the Castle of le Ove, where after maintaining a Siege of three months, he was forced at last to capitulate. Thus Charles who had conquered the Kingdom of Naples in the space of three weeks, lost it with the same rapidity. He formed afterwards several projects to recover his Conquest, which, by the obstacles that occurred, came to nothing.

This year the Emperor Maximilian came into the Low-Countries, and resigned the Government to his Son Philip, though he still wanted some years of being of Age. After that, he returned into Germany. Philip being no longer under the Emperor's Guardianship, sent, about the end of the year, Ambassadors to Henry to desire the renewal of the Commerce between England and the Low-Countries.

The Ambassadors found no great difficulty to succeed in their Negotiation. The renewal of the Commerce which they were come to desire, was no less necessary for the English than for the Flemings. So, the 24th of February 1496 was concluded at London a Treaty of Peace and perpetual amity between Henry and Philip, and the Trade between the two nations was settled to the satisfaction of both parties.

Among the Articles of this Treaty, there were two particularly remarkable. By the first, the two Princes engaged to give neither aid nor refuge to the rebellious Subjects of either. Particularly, Philip obliged himself expressly to hinder the Duchess Dowager of Burgundy, from harbouring the King's rebellious Subjects in the Lands she possessed, by what title soever she held them, whether of Dower or otherwise. That in case she acted contrary to this prohibition, he promised to deprive her of all her possessions in the Low-Countries.

By another Article it was expressly agreed, that any Vessel suffering Shipwreck on the Coasts of either of the two Princes, should not be liable to confiscation, provided there was left alive a Man, Woman, or Child, a Dog, a Cat, or a Cock.

The Flemings called this Treaty Intercursus Magnus, or the great Treaty of Commerce, not only by reason of the great number of Articles, but chiefly with respect to another, made afterwards, and which not being so much to their advantage, was termed Intercursus Malus or the bad Treaty.

We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that March the 5th this year, the King granted a Patent to John Cabot a Venetian, and to three of his Sons (3), to go in quest of new Lands with English Colours (4). The Terms were, that after all charges deducted, they should give the King a fifth of the Profit (5).

Mean while, the King of Scotland, not content with affording the pretended Duke of York a Sanctuary in his Dominions, would likewise undertake to place him on the Throne of England. He was told, that as soon as he appeared in that Kingdom at the head of an Army, all the Yorkists would rise in favour of the Pretender. To that end it was, that immediately after his arrival in England he took care to disperse the counterfeit Duke's Proclamations, wherein the King was termed Lusper Tyrant, and Murderer. Moreover, he promised all sorts of favours to such as would join the lawful Heir, to destroy him that unjustly detained the Crown. But this Proclamation was so ineffectual, that not a Man offered to join the Scots. The truth is, Henry was not beloved, especially in those parts. But as, since Pekie had begun to appear by the name of Duke of York, many were undeceived, and others in doubt, it was not thought proper to hazard life and fortune, without a greater assurance that it was really for a Son of Edward IV. Besides, the execution of the Lord Chamberlain was a terror to all, as no Man could reasonably expect the King's pardon, since that Lord was not spared. At length, James seeing he waited in vain that the English would take arms in favour of his Duke of York, and being unwilling wholly to lose his labour, ravaged Northumberland and got a great booty. Then Perkin feigning to be extremely moved with the calamities of the English, conjured that Prince, before his whole Court, to spare his miserable Subjects. This was a very artful device to persuade the Publick he was really what he pretended to be. James replied with a smile, he thought him very generous to be so careful for what was none of his, in order to save it for his enemy's use. Mean while, the news that an English Army was advancing, made him resolve to return into his own Country, being unwilling to expose his great spoil to the hazard of a Battle. Thus the expedition, from which he expected so great effects, ended only in the ruin of the People of Northumberland.

Whilst these things passed in England, Charles VIII fearing Henry would enter into the League of Italy, took care to have the Peace of Etaples confirmed by the States, as he was bound by the Treaty, which he had hitherto neglected, though it was confirmed by the Parliament of England the last year. However, as he thought not proper to assemble the States General, he caused the Peace to be approved by the States of each Province, with which, in all appearance, Henry was satisfied. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the approbations of the States of Languedoc, Normandy, and several other Provinces, as likewise of particular Towns of little note, signed by great numbers of common people, as Tradesmen and Craftsmen.

Though the King of Scotland's Invasion had produced no great effect, Henry was however apprehensive of the

He knew his Subjects were not pleased; that the Yorkists were very numerous; that Ireland was not well-affected; and that Perkin Warbeck was in Scotland ready to take advantage of these dispositions. So, to prevent the danger which might arise from all these quarters, he granted first a general pardon to all the Irish Adherents of the pretended Duke of York, left the dread of punishment should carry them to revolt. In the second place, he commissioned Richard Fox Bishop of Durham to try, as of himself, to enter into Negotiation with the King of Scotland, to treat of the marriage of his eldest Daughter Margaret with that Prince. Lastly, he sent Ambassadors (1) to Ferdinand and Isabella, to confirm his Alliance with them, and secure, by fresh engagements, the marriage of Arthur his eldest Son with Catherine their third Daughter.

by Escuage) much less when the Scotch Invasion was made a pretence to fleece the whole Kingdom. That it would be a shame to submit to such an oppression, and all the mischief folly proceeded from the King's Ministers, who made their Court at the poor people's cost: That to free themselves from these grievances, it was proper to take arms, and without inviting any person, go and present a Petition to the King, to pay him to desist from this Tax, and punish his evil Counsellors, for a warning to others how they gave him such advice for the future: That a greater service could not be done to the Kingdom, than to deliver it from such Harpies, who ruined it under colour of procuring the King's good.

Flammock's chief aim was at [Mr.] Archbishop of Hereford, Canterbury, and Reginald Pole, because they were generally the King's instruments in affairs of the nature.

Flammock and Jessy perceiving the people began to take fire, entered to lead them, and some portion of quality should lead them, which, as they felt, would form.

And indeed, it appeared afterwards, they were encouraged by Perkins of greater counsel. This was sufficient to excite all the rabble of the Country to an insurrection; and among themselves in the best manner they could, they marched under the conduct of these two incendiaries into Derbyshire, and then thence into Somersetshire. The number of the rebels was increased, by many People of the places where they passed, who had nothing to lose, and were animated by the King's secret enemies.

At Tewkesbury, they killed a Countess's son (6), who had fortified himself by the King's aid in the Subsidy. This was all the mischief they did in their march. Then they proceeded to Wells, where the Lord Audley (7), a Noblesman of a restless and discontented Spirit came and joined them, and was immediately accepted as their General. Audley putting himself at their head, led them directly to Saundersbury, and from thence to Winchester, without suffering them to commit any violence, and obliging them to be satisfied with a bare subsistence.

When they came to Winchester, instead of marching to London, as was intended at first, they forced their General to lead them into Kent. Flammock having told them, the People of that County were very fond of liberty, they fancied they should be immediately joined by them, in defence of the rights and privileges of the Nation.

But when they came there, they were greatly disappointed. By the diligence of some Kentish Lords (8), not a Man offered to take arms in their favour. This coldness discouraged many of the rebels, who forebore their enterprise would not be successful, returned quietly to their homes.

But those that remained, being incited by the King's remissions, who had softened them to proceed so far unmolested, intemperately troubled, they would give him Battle, or take London before his face. In this resolution they went and encamped (9) between Greenwich and Eltham, within a few miles of London.

When the King first heard of this Insurrection, he was under some Consternation. A war with Scotland, a Rebellion in the Kingdom, and a Pretender to the Crown, seemed to him to be three affairs of the last Importance, especially as they came upon him at once.

Besides, his inward uneasiness concerning the doubtfulness of his title, helped to magnify objects. He was apprehensive that the Cornish Rebellion was the beginning of a general Conspiracy, whereof Perkin was waiting the time in Scotland. Happily for him, this Rebellion was at a time when he had an army in readiness, which was to march into the North, under the Command of the Lord Admiral.

But the news of the Insurrection made him keep his Forces about London, not thinking it to send them into the North at such a juncture. He contained himself, therefore, with detaching the Earl of Surrey, and sending him towards the borders of Scotland to oppose King James, in case he thought of making a second invasion into England.

Mean while, the Rebels traversed the Counties, and the King made no motion to stop them. This conduct surprized all the World, considering it was his Custom speedily to march to the place where danger began to appear. But upon this occasion he thought but to act otherwise for several reasons. First, he was very loath the Rebels were so far from their homes, and fastidied themselves with long marches. In the second place, as did not see any

But the chief reason of his slowness was, that he would see if they had any Correspondents in other Countries, in order to divide his army, if necessary, or hasten to the relief of the weakest. In fine, Age, and the continued enjoyment of a Crown, had, doubtless, rendered him less in love with dangers. Any other way seemed to him less hazardous than a battle, to remedy Evils of this nature.

But when the Rebels were encamped on Black-Heath, from whence they might have a prospect of London, the King could no longer delay to attack them. He would have given occasion to believe his coldness proceeded from fear, which might have produced very ill effects among the people. However, as he was much superior to the Male-contents, both in number of Troops and Military knowledge, he resolved to dispose all things, as to leave little to Hazard or Fortune. To that end, he divided his army into three Bodies, the first whereof, commanded by the Earl of Oxford (1), was ordered behind the hill, where the Rebels were encamped, to cut off their retreat, and, if necessary, attack them in the rear. The second, led by the Lord d'Aubeny, was appointed to charge them in the front. The King retained the third about his own person, and encamped in St. George's Fields, that in case of ill Success he might be ready to renew the fight, or throw himself into London and secure the City as he should think proper. Besides, he was not so far off, but he could succour his people during the battle.

Every thing succeeded as the King expected. The Rebels suffered themselves to be deceived by a report he had caused to be spread, that he intended to give them battle on the Monday following, whereas he attacked them on the Saturday, which of all the days of the week he fancied to be the most fortunate. As they expected it not, they were so surprized that they had scarce time to draw up. On the other hand, for want of Intelligence, they suffered themselves to be surrounded by the Earl of Oxford, who being posted behind them, hindered their retreat. So, of six thousand (2), which was their number, two thousand were slain on the spot, and the rest forced to surrender at discretion, there being no way to escape. The King for this once, caused to be executed only the Lord Audley (3), Flammock and the Farrier (4), who were taken alive, but gave the prisoners to the Captors, with leave to compound with them for their ransoms as they should judge fit. It is not unlikely, that the moderation of the Rebels in their march from Cornwall to London, tempered also the King's Severity; especially as they had not asserted the title of the House of York, a Crime he never forgave. Be this as it will, he was satisfied with these three Victims, for the expiation of this great Rebellion.

But the Earl of Surrey, then in Yorkshire, hastening to its relief (5), James raised the Siege and retired into his own Kingdom. The Earl of Surrey, not satisfied with driving him out of England, pursued him into Scotland, and took the little Town of Aton. This war was inconvenient to the King upon several accounts. First, he could not continue it, without using all the Money given by the Parliament, which he would have gladly avoided. Besides, Perkin Warbeck made him uneasy, and he perceived it would be easier to remove him from Scotland by Treaty, than by Arms. He would not however make the first advances, but wished the proposal of peace to come from another, to avoid the disgrace of a refusal, in case the King of Scotland was disinclined.

XII. p. 668.

Whilst he was in this perplexity, he bethought himself that Don Pedro d'Ayala, the Spanish Ambassador, would be a proper Instrument to accomplish this affair. Ayala willingly undertook to go to the King of Scotland, and propose, as of himself, an agreement with the King of England. He used for pretence, that King Ferdinand his master, could receive no greater satisfaction, than to see the two Kings his Friends and Allies, live in peace and good neighbourhood. This expedient succeeded according to Henry's expectation. The Ambassador found the King of Scotland so well inclined, that he wrote to the King, if he would enter into Negotiation, he did not question the success. Whereupon the two Kings sent their Ambassadors (6) to Aton to treat of a Peace, Ayala performing the office of mediator. The greatest difficulty that occurred in this Negotiation, was concerning Perkin Warbeck, whom Henry demanded, and the King of Scotland would not deliver. The Bishop of Durham (7) perceiving he could not gain that point, proposed an Interview of the two Kings at Newcastle. But when it was mentioned to the King of Scotland, he said, though he was very desirous of Peace, he would not go and beg it of his enemy. At length, an expedient was found agreeable to both parties. And that was, the King of Scotland should honorably dismiss the pretended Duke of York, before the Negotiation of a Peace was carried any farther, lest he should be thought to be forced to it; that afterwards they should treat as if Perkin had never been in Scotland.

Pursuant to this agreement, James told the pretended Duke, he had done for him all that lay in his power: That he had twice entered England at the head of an Army, to try the disposition of the English: That not having found what was expected, there was no likelihood that with his forces alone, he could place him on the Throne, and disposess a King so firmly established: That his misfortune proceeded solely from the English refusing to espouse his quarrel, and his being forsaken by those who had engaged him in the undertaking, whilst the Scots exposed their Lives for his sake: That therefore he advised him to seek his fortune elsewhere; but nevertheless, he would make good what he told him at first, That he should not repent of putting himself into his hands. Perkin seeing the King of Scotland bent to dismiss him, thanked him for the protection he had hitherto given him, and for all his other favours, entreating him to convey him into Ireland with his Wife, which the King immediately granted.

As soon as Perkin Warbeck was removed from Scotland, there were no farther obstacles to a Peace. The Ambassadors, assembled at Aton, signed a Truce for seven years, commencing the 30th of September, the day of signing the Treaty. It was expressly agreed, that neither of the two Kings should make war upon the other, by himself or Subjects, or by any other Person, whereby Perkin Warbeck was sufficiently understood without naming him: That with respect to certain points not settled by the Ambassadors, the two Kings referred them to the decision of Ferdinand and Isabella. Afterwards this Truce, limited to seven years, was prolonged till a year after the death of the Survivor of the two Princes. In fine, each of the two Kings gave Letters Patents to the Mediator, desiring him to report to Ferdinand and Isabella the differences yet undecided, promising to stand to their determination. These Letters were full of marks of esteem and acknowledgment for the Ambassador, and the two Kings showed how well pleased they were with his equity, wisdom, impartiality, and the trouble he had readily taken upon him. Nothing could be more honorable for Ayala, whom the English and Scotch Writers call Hialis or Elias, than the perfect confidence placed in him by these two Monarchs. As he entered the City, he took his Sword from his side and gave it to the Mayor, to be always carried before him, honouring by that mark of distinction the zeal shown by the Citizens for his service. On the morrow, he caused some of the Rebels to be hanged in sacrifice to the Inhabitants of Exeter, and as a sort of satisfaction for what they had suffered. For the rest who had submitted to his mercy, he gave them indeed their lives; but withal appointed Commissioners (1) to punish them by fines. He proceeded on this occasion, with excessive severity. One would have thought he repented of giving them their lives, and designed to starve the miserable wretches after freeing them from the Gallows.

This done, he advised with his Council, upon what should be done with Perkin, who was still invested in his Sanctuary. Some were for taking him out by force and putting him to death, not at all questioning, that after the execution, the King might easily agree with the Pope. Others on the contrary believed, that according to the License granted by Innocent VIII's Bull, it sufficed to have him narrowly watched, and that, without necessity, such an advantage should not be given to the Pope. Moreover, that the King ought carefully to avoid being deemed a violator of Sanctuaries, of which his Enemies would not fail to take the advantage. In short, some there were who plainly told the King, he would never satisfy the people, that Perkin Warbeck was an Impostor, unless Warbeck himself freely undeceived those that were seduced by his artifices: That therefore the best method that could be taken was, to engage him by a pardon to make himself a confession of his Crime. The King following this advice, sent to offer Perkin his Life, if he would voluntarily surrender himself. Perkin readily accepted the offer. He saw himself so strictly watched and guarded, that he despaired to make his escape. Besides, supposing he could have escaped, he was destitute of all hopes, after an unsuccessful Trial of so many different means.

Shortly after, the King ordered Perkin to be brought to Court, as if he was entirely at liberty, but however, attended by several persons who were commanded to guard him with all care, lest he made his escape. Every one might see and talk with him; but he could never obtain leave to throw himself at the King's Feet, though the King, to satisfy his curiosity, saw him without being seen. After that, Perkin was conducted to London. He was all the way exposed to the insults and derision of the people; but seemed to bear all with great courage and constancy. Never did he ask the Prince better than upon this occasion, without affecting too great an Insensibility, or showing too much dejection. When he was come to London, he was made to ride twice through the City, that people might have time and opportunity to view him well, after which, he was confined in the Tower (2). A few days after was executed one of his chief Confidants, who not caring to take Sanctuary with him in Bewley, chose rather to wander about the Country in a Hermite's dress (3). This execution being over, Perkin Warbeck was privately examined, and his Confession published, giving an exact account of all his actions, and the places where he had lived ever since he was born. But all were surprised to find no particulars of the Conspiracy or the Authors. The Dukes of Burgundy herself was not so much as named. Some took occasion from thence to confirm themselves in the belief, that the person called Perkin Warbeck was the true Duke of York. They were persuaded, that this affected Silence was not without mystery, and that the King durst not infer in Perkin's pretended Confession, any of the circumstances relating to foreign Princes, for fear of being publicly contradicted by persons who would not have for him the same regard as his own Subjects. As for what was published concerning Perkin's Life and Kindred, nothing, as they said, was easier than to invent such Stories. Some however believed the King was thus silent, out of complaisance to the King of France, the Emperor, Archduke, Dukes of Burgundy, and King of Scotland: And that there were even English Lords engaged in the plot, against whom he did not think fit to proceed.

The year 1498, ended with an accident, which gave the King no small concern. Whilst he was at his Palace of Shene, a fire broke out the 21st of December with that violence, that in few hours the building was entirely consumed, with all the rich Furniture. As Henry was very fond of that Palace, he caused it, soon after, to be rebuilt from the ground, calling it Richmond, which name it retains to this day (4).

This same year Isabella Queen of Portugal was solemnly acknowledged presumptive Heir of Castile and Aragon, by the States of these two Kingdoms. But shortly after she died in Childbed at Saragossa, having seen delivered of a Prince, who was named Alfonso, and who claimed presumptive Successor of Portugal and Aragon.

Since Lewis XII ascended the Throne of France, he had been employed in contriving how to recover the Duchy of Milan, which he claimed in right of Isabella of Milan his Grandmother.

The Truce between England and Scotland being concluded, as I said, to the satisfaction of both Kingdoms, the Scots conversed familiarly with their neighbours the English, particularly with the Inhabitants of Norham. This Town, which was fortified with a good Castle and a strong Garrison, is situated on the little River Tweed, which parts the two Kingdoms. It happened one day, some Scotchmen walking out of the Town, stood looking attentively upon the Castle, which breeding suspicion in the Soldiers of the Garrison, they sent to them to retire. The Scots taking it ill to be suspected, returned an angry answer, and in short, falling from words to blows, some of them were killed. The affair being brought before the Wardens of the Marches, was neglected, so that after many delays, the King of Scotland sent Ambassadors (5) into England to demand speedy satisfaction. Henry, who had no mind to quarrel with James, replied, that what had been done was a mere chance and without his privity: but however, he was ready to make all convenient satisfaction, and to that end would send Ambassadors to the King of Scotland. Buchanan and the Lord Bacon, Henry the Seventh's Historian, affirm, the first overture of the Marriage between King James and the Princess Margaret was made during this Negotiation, and that James himself proposed it to Richard Fox Bishop of Durham. Whereas it appears in the Collection of the Public Acts, that, above four years before, Henry had projected this Marriage, and probably, caused it, as I said, to be suggested to the King of Scotland, by some indirect means. As the Bishop of Durham could not be ignorant of the King's intention, since he had been twice commissioned to treat of this Marriage, he failed not to inspire King James with hopes, that the Business would be ended to his satisfaction. Shortly after, the Ambassadors of the two Kingdoms (6) meeting at Sterling to decide the Norham affairs, renewed the former Truce, adding certain Articles to prevent the like Accidents. After that, Henry appointed the Bishop of Durham to settle with the King of Scotland the Articles of the intended Marriage. This affair was not however finished till January 1502.

Perkin Warbeck, accustomed to live like a Prince, was heartily tired of the Tower, where doubtless he was not treated as such. Though according to appearance, the King had ordered him to be strictly guarded, he found means to escape, and take the road into Kent, where he hoped to meet with some Ship to carry him out of the Kingdom. But hearing that orders were every where sent to apprehend him, he thought proper to fly to the Monastery of Bethlehem (7), which enjoyed the Privilege of Sanctuary (8). It was difficult for the Prior to protect such a Person, and yet he could not resolve either to let him go elsewhere, or violate the Privilege of the House, in delivering him to the King. In this perplexity, he chose to wait upon the King, and acquainting him that Perkin Warbeck was in his hands, petitioned for his Life, leaving him otherwise to the King's discretion. The King readily saw, it would not be possible to draw Perkin out of the Monastery to put him to death, without making great noise. So, on pretence of his great respect for the Prior, who was a person very much revered, he granted the prisoner his Life, but ordered him to be set in the Stocks a whole day, in the Palace Court at Westminster, and next day at the Cross in Cheapside (9), from whence he was conveyed to the Tower (10). 1429. Some naturally should have been thrown into some Dungeon, and yet his Confinement was not the most rigorous, since he had the Liberty to converse with the rest of the prisoners.

After he had remained some time in this state, he found means to gain four Servants of Sir John Digby, Lieutenant of the Tower, with whom he plotted to kill their master, seize the Keys of the Tower, and escape with the Earl of Warwick, who had been all perverted to come into the plot, out of hopes of recovering his liberty, of which he had been so long unjustly debarred. But unhappily for them, the affair was discovered before it could be executed. It was scarce doubted, that the King himself was the contriver of this plot, and that his aim was to draw at once Perkin Warbeck and the Earl of Warwick into the snare, in order to put them both to death. Indeed several reasons rendered it credible. First, it was very surprising, that Perkin was not more closely confined, after his attempt to make his escape. Secondly, it was not likely, that in his Circumstances, unable to reward Sir John Digby's Servants, they should expose themselves to such danger for his sake. In the third place, Perkin was too cunning to join with the Earl of Warwick, who would have hurt him only, though they had been so happy as to escape. Lastly, supposing they had killed the Governor without being discovered, and got the Keys of the Tower, how could they expect that the Guards would have opened the gate, or suffered it to be opened in the night, without examining the Persons that went out, or without the Governor's express order. But what further confirms this suspicion of the King, was, that about the same time a young Man, one Wilford a Shoemaker's Son, pretended to be the Earl of Warwick. He was accompanied, or rather guided and directed by an Augustin Friar, called Patrick, who had the boldness to preach publicly in some Town in Kent, that Wilford was the Earl of Warwick, and exhort the people to take arms in his favour. They were both apprehended, and Wilford was hanged, but the Friar pardoned (1). This gave occasion to believe, Wilford had been seduced by the Friar, and by the King's particular direction, that it might be thought less strange, that he put him to death, under colour of causing fresh troubles.

However this be, it is certain the King was resolved to free himself at once from all his uneasiness occasioned by Perkin Warbeck and the Earl of Warwick. Though it cannot positively be said, that he laid a snare for them, at least, this Plot furnished him with a plausible reason to deliver them over to Justice. Perkin was condemned (2) by Commissioners [of Oyer and Terminer] to be hanged, and was executed with the Mayor of Cork (3) and his Son, who had been his constant companions in all his adventures. Of eight others that were condemned with them, among whom were Sir John Digby's four Servants, there were but two executed. Such was the end of Perkin Warbeck, who had been acknowledged for lawful King in Ireland, France, Flanders, England, Scotland, and made Henry shake in his Throne. Perhaps he would have succeeded in his designs, had he been to deal with a less politic Prince. However, it is certain the King was not enough careful to undeceive the publick, and that the proofs produced to show Perkin was an Impostor, being taken only from a private examination, seemed not sufficiently evident.

In a few days after Perkin's death (4), the Earl of Warwick was brought before the House of Peers, the Earl of Oxford exercising, by Commission, the office of High-Steward. He was arraigned, not for attempting to escape, which could not be deemed High-Treason, since he was not imprisoned for any such crime, nor even for any other, but for conspiring the King's death jointly with Perkin Warbeck. The poor Prince confessing that he gave his consent to the project laid by Perkin and Digby's Servants, was condemned to lose his head, and the sentence was executed on Tower-hill (5). He was the last Male-Heir of the House of York, which in truth was the Crime that cost him his life, the King chusing rather to sacrifice his own reputation, than be disappointed of securing the Crown both to himself and his Heirs. To lessen in some measure People's horror of this Cruelty, the King caused it to be published, that King Ferdinand had positively declared, he would never consent to marry his Daughter Catherine to Prince Arthur, so long as the Earl of Warwick was alive. Strange sort of Apology tending to insinuate, that the Marriage of the Princess of Spain was so necessary for England, that it must be purchased with Blood! But if this marriage was not requisite for the State, it was at least very beneficial to the King, who was to receive two hundred thousand Crowns of Gold for Catherine's Dowry. This alone would have induced him to sacrifice the Earl of Warwick, though he had no other advantage by his death. From a like motive he had beheaded the Lord Chamberlain. Mean while, very probably, what was published concerning King Ferdinand, was only a mere pretence to excite Henry, since Arthur's Marriage with Catherine was solemnized by Proxy the 19th of May, this very year before the Earl of Warwick's death (6).

Louis XII. had solemnly ratified and sworn the Peace of Estaples, a little after his accession to the Crown. But being desirous to show Henry, he really intended to keep it, he caused it to be approved and ratified by the States-General, assembled at Nantz in the beginning of the year. Then, he sent Ambassadors to the Pope, to pray him to confirm it by his authority. The Pope being no farther obstacle from France, issued out a Bull of communication against whoever of the two Kings should not observe the Treaty.

It was not without reason that Louis desired to preserve the Peace made by his predecessor with England. He had formed a design to seize the Duchy of Milan, and to that end made a league with the Venetians, who were to have for their share all that part of the Milanese situate beyond the Adda. This same year the Condottieres attacked the Duchy of Milan, and Ludovico Sforza, the most perfidious of Men, being forsaken by all the World, was forced to fly to the Emperor, having lost all his places, except the Castle of Milan. Genoa, of which he was possessed, followed the example of the Milanese, in voluntarily surrendering to the King of France.

Frederick King of Naples, who had succeeded Ferdinand his Nephew, fearing, the preparations in France were designed against him, gave Henry speedy notice that he desired to be included in the Peace he had lately renewed with France. But it was not with him that Louis intended to deal this year. He reserved the War of Naples after the Conquest of the Milanese.

Alexander VI. having published a Jubilee for the year 1500, the last of the Century, had granted by his Bull to all Christians at a distance from Rome, the privilege of the Jubilee without being obliged to visit the Churches of that City; but on condition of paying such a sum for the favour. This was an infallible way to draw money from all the States of Christendom, where he had sent Commissioners to levy it. The Commissioner appointed for England was Jasper Foss a Spaniard, who wisely discharged his commission without noise or scandal, and carried a good sum of money to his master (7).

Besides this affair, he was charged with another which seemed of great moment, but tended, like the first, only to fill the Pope's Coffers. He had orders to acquaint the Kings, that the Pope was resolved to publish a Crusade against the Turks: That therefore it was agreed with the Ambassadors of several Potentates, that the Hungarians, Poles, and Bohemians should make War upon the Turks in Thrace; the French and Spaniards in Greece; and himself, with the King of England, the Venetians, and Princes of Italy, who were most powerful at Sea, should attack Constantinople: That in consequence of this resolution, he had sent Nuncios to all the Courts, to exhort the Sovereigns amicably to end their private quarrels, that all the Forces of Christendom might be united together for so pious an undertaking. Alexander VI. was too well known, to be thought to act upon this occasion from a motive of religion and zeal for the glory of God. Consequently, it was easy to see that the sole design of this Crusade was to heap up money by voluntary contributions, as well from private Persons as Sovereigns. However, as Henry was unwilling to show his dislike of this project, which probably would meet with obstacles enough elsewhere, he told the Nuncio, "That no Prince in all Christendom should be more zealous than himself, to promote this affair, to the glory of God and the good of the Church: but as his 1500. "Dominions were so remote from Constantinople, as he had no Gallies, and as his Mariners were not sufficiently acquainted with the Mediterranean Sea, he judged it more proper that the Kings of France and Spain should accompany his Heir, by Sea; where, by, not only all things would be sooner ready, but the jealousy wisely avoided, which would infallibly arise between these two Monarchs, in case they should march together by land, without a Superior: That for his part, he would freely contribute both Men and money towards the undertaking. But if the Kings of France and Spain should refuse to accompany him, Pope, he would go himself and command under him, provided all differences between the Christian Princes were first appeased, (which he should not obstruct,) and since he was in Peace with all the World,) and some good Towns on the Coast of Italy put into his hands, to serve for retreat in case of necessity."

The Prince
him.

The Pope early perceived the meaning of this answer, and as probably the rest of the Princes would return like, the Crusade vanished into air. Mean while Henry, to display his zeal, appointed Ambassadors to go to Rome to treat with the Pope concerning that affair. But I do not know whether these Ambassadors ever went from London. Henry's answer being made publick, the Knights of Rhodes elected him for Protector of their Order, imagining there was no Prince in Christendom more zealous than himself for Religion.

The Plague having for some time raged in England (1), the King, after frequent change of places, resolved to go and make some stay at Calais with his Family, till the danger was over. Upon his arrival (2), the Archduke Philip, sent Ambassadors to welcome him into those parts, and express his desire of paying him a visit. But without moved him to appoint for their interview, some place that was not a walled Town; not but that he had a perfect confidence in him, but because he had already refused to confer with the King of France in a fortified place. Henry very civilly accepted this compliment, and appointed the place to be at St. Peter's Church without the Gates of Calais. Then he sent Ambassadors to Philip to return his compliment, and tell him with what impatience he expected him. Some days after, being informed that the Archduke was near Calais, he rid out of the Town to receive him. When Philip saw him he alighted and offered to hold the King's stirrup. But Henry not permitting him, they embraced, and withdrawing into the Church, had a long conference. The Archduke willing to efface the impression which his protection of Perkin might have made in the King's mind, showed an ardent desire to live in a good understanding with him, calling him his Patron and Father; as appears in the King's letter to the Mayor of London, acquainting him with what passed at the interview. It is said also, that overtures were made of cross marriages between Henry Duke of York the King's second Son, and Margaret Sister of Philip and Widow of the Prince of Spain, and between Charles Son of Philip, and Mary the King's second Daughter. Charles was born the 24th of February this year, and by the death of Prince Michael of Portugal, about the same time, was become presumptive Heir of the Crowns of Castile and Aragon.

This year, the Pope at the request of Lewis XII himself gave a Bull, whereby that Prince was declared excommunicate, if he failed in his payments contained in the Treaty of Estaphes.

The Ambassadors of England and Scotland, being at length agreed upon the terms of the marriage between King James and Margaret, the Pope granted a dispensation. But as the Princess was only between ten and eleven years old, it was not consummated till three years after.

Henry was then in Peace with all the Princes of Europe, and there was no appearance of any troubles in his Kingdom. Consequently he had no sort of pretence to demand of his Parliament new Subsidies. This way of raising money, of which he was so greedy, failing him, other methods were to be devised. Perkin Warbeck's affair was a plentiful fountain which was not yet exhausted. The Commission he had established whilst at Exeter, regarded properly such only as had actually taken arms against him. But though that Commission had brought him in very large sums, he was not yet satisfied. Under colour, that those who had any way adhered to Warbeck's party, were still liable to the rigour of the Law, he was ready to grant them a pardon unasked; but it was on condition, they paid the fines laid upon them. For that purpose he appointed new Commissioners (3) to make inquest of those that assisted Michael the Farrier, author of the first Cornish Rebellion, and Perkin Warbeck the impostor, with power to pardon them upon their paying fines at the Commissioners discretion. He ordered likewise the estates of such as were dead to be seized and sold, if the Heirs refused to make a reasonable composition. It is easy to see from hence, that if the King had been favorable to the Rebels during the troubles, it was only out of fear of driving them to despair, whilst they were yet heated, since he spared them not, as soon as he believed them to be no longer dangerous.

Cardinal Morton Archbishop of Canterbury was accused of being the author of these oppressions. But it was afterwards perceived, they sprung from the King himself. The Archbishop died the latter end of this, or the beginning of the next year (4), little regretted by the English, who were greatly prejudiced against him. Henry Dean of Salisbury succeeded him, but had not long possession till the August following (5). Before we close this year, it will be necessary briefly to mention what passed in Italy.

After Lewis XII was become master of the Duchy of Milan, he turned his thoughts to the Conquest of Naples. Though probably, he might alone have conquered that Kingdom, he made however an Alliance with the King of Aragon, whereby they agreed to join their Forces, and share the Conquest between them. Ferdinand was to have Apulia and Calabria, and Lewis the City of Naples, Abruzzo and Terra di Lavoro. This Treaty being signed, Ferdinand sent an Army into Italy under the command of the famous Gonzalos, commonly called the great Captain. Lewis gave the conduct of his Army to d'Aubigny, to the Earl of Gaiuzano and Caspar Borgia the Pope's Bastard, who having quitted the Cardinalate, was become Duke of Valentinois. The French Fleet was commanded by Philip of Cleves Lord of Ravenstein. In a very short space, each of the two Kings became master of the portion assigned him by the Treaty, and the unfortunate Federick King of Naples was forced to cast himself upon the mercy of Lewis XII, who sent him to live in France with a pension of thirty thousand Crowns.

Henry having no war with any of his neighbours, lived in great Tranquillity, and the more, as he saw in England no Lord in condition to create him uneasiness. The ability he had shown in several affairs, as well foreign as domestick, which had unexpectedly come upon him, kept his Neighbours in awe, and his Subjects in obedience. So, which way soever he turned his eyes, he saw nothing capable of disturbing his quiet. Mean while, when he least expected it, he thought a new storm was gathering against him, but he was more afraid than hurt. The Earl of Suffolk (6), Nephew of Edward IV, and Richard III, and Brother of the Earl of Lincoln, slain at Stoke-field, quarrelling with a Man, had the misfortune to kill him. This accident might have given the King a pretence to free himself from the Earl, who could not but be odious to him, since he was, by his Mother, of the House of York. However, whether the action in it self was not ill, or for some other reason, the King was pleased to forgive him, on condition he openly pleaded his pardon. The Earl more offended at this Ignominy, than grateful for the favour granted him, retired shortly after into Flanders, to his Aunt the Duchess of Burgundy. Henry was startled at his retreat, imagining he was gone into the Low-Countries, to contrive some plot against him. His constant uneasiness, with respect to his Crown, made him apprehensive, that the least beginnings would be attended with bad consequences. And therefore, not to give the Earl of Suffolk time to concert new Projects with the Duchess of Burgundy, he so wrought with him by Messages, that he returned into England, where he was very readily pardoned. The Duchess of Burgundy was grown old, and tired with so many fruitless attempts to dethrone Henry. Besides, she could expect no further assistance from the Archduke, who was willing to live in a good understanding with him.

This year abounded in Marriages, and Projects of Marriages of consequence. The Archduke going into Spain by land, had an opportunity to confer with Lewis XII, and conclude with him a Marriage between his

In fine, Catherine of Arragon, Daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, coming into England in October (1), her Marriage with Arthur Prince of Wales was solemnized the 14th of November. Though the Prince was but in the sixteenth year of his Age (2), it was not questioned whether the Marriage was consummated. The Prince himself next morning said several things which left no room to doubt it. And yet, there were afterwards very warm disputes upon it, Catherine, or her Council affirming, there was no Consummation. But it is not yet time to speak of this matter.

Dispensation granted to Thomas Wolsey

Thomas Wolsey, afterwards Archbishop of York, and Cardinal, who made so great a figure in England, was now Rector of the Parish-Church of Lymington in the Diocese of Bath and Wells. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, that in November this year, the Pope, in consideration of his distinguished Merit, granted him a Dispensation to hold two Benefices that were inconsistent.

Though the Dispensation for the King of Scotland's Marriage was come, Henry made no great haste to finish that affair, by reason of his Daughter's tender age. At length, the Princess being entered upon her thirteenth year the 29th of November 1501, James sent Ambassadors to London, where every thing concerning the Marriage was settled, and the Contract drawn in form the 24th of January 1502. Henry gave with his Daughter thirty thousand Angel Nobles of Gold (3), [each Noble worth twenty Groates, or Groats] payable in three years. James settled upon the Princess his Spouse, a Jointure of two thousand pounds Sterling a year in Land, of which however, he was to receive the Income during his Life, and allow her only a thousand pounds a year at her own disposal. It was further agreed, that the might have twenty four English Servants, and when one died, the might appoint another in his room: That the Marriage should be performed per verba de Presenti, about the Feast of Purification; but the King of Scotland should not think of having Margaret in his hands till September the 1st, 1503. That then Henry should cause her to be conducted, at his expence, to the borders of the two Kingdoms. Before this Contract was signed, a Privy Counsellor represented to the King, that it was not impossible but this Marriage might one day give England a Scotch Sovereign (4). Whereupon the King replied, supposing that should be, the strongest would carry it from the weakest, and Scotland be annexed to England, and not England to Scotland, which fell out accordingly.

Brother made Prince of Wales.

The same day were signed also two other Treaties, one of perpetual Peace and Amity between Scotland and England, and the other concerning the outrages that might be committed on both Sides contrary to the Peace. Whilst the Court was rejoicing for the Marriage of the Queen of Scotland, Prince Arthur her Brother was seized with a Distemper which laid him in his Grave. He died the 2d of April, about five months after his Marriage, and in the seventeenth year of his age (5). As the Princess his Widow might be with Child, the King delayed two or three months to create Henry his second Son, Prince of Wales. The Lord Bacon says in his History, that Henry was not made Prince of Wales till February 1503 (6). But we find in the Collection of the Public Acts, Letters Patents of the 22d of June 1502, wherein he is styled Prince of Wales, a clear Evidence that he was now invested with that Principality.

Henry makes the Emperor a present of Money
Henry makes the Emperor a present of Money.
In p. 75, 9, 20.

Shortly after, Henry received an Embassy from the Emperor Maximilian, to propose a League against the Turks. This Embassy was properly only a pretence to demand of the King an aid of Money, which the Emperor promised punctually to repay. But the King knowing Maximilian to be always in want, chose rather to make him a present of ten thousand pounds, than to lend him the Sum he desired. As for the League proposed by the Emperor, Henry did not think fit to engage in it, contenting himself with stipulating, that the ten thousand pounds should be employed in the war against the Infidels. He concluded with him however a Treaty of Commerce, and another of Friendship and Alliance, which was to last one year after the death of the Survivor. Moreover it was agreed, that Maximilian, and his Son the Archduke, should be admitted into the Order of the Garter, and Henry into that of the Golden Flece. Pursuant to this agreement, Henry sent Ambassadors (7) to Maximilian, with the Order of the Garter, and to see him swear to the Treaties.

About the same time Ladislaus King of Hungary, finding himself pressed by the Turks, and desiring the assistance of the Christian Princes, Henry sent Ambassadors to treat with him. But their power was limited to the promise, in his name, of a Sum of Money to be employed against the Infidels.

During the rest of the year nothing extraordinary passed in England. James and Henry were entirely taken up with confirming and ratifying their three late Treaties, and swearing to observe them. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, the Ambassadors of the King of England (8) having delivered to King James a writing, containing the Oath he was to take, and he reading it as it was, inadvertently gave Henry the Title of King of France. But afterwards perceiving his error, he took publicly another Oath, wherein the words, and of France, were omitted, and made that his authentic act. He was afraid, no doubt, the King of France would be displeased with his giving Henry that Title, though it was of no great Importance.

We see likewise in the Collection, that on the 9th of December, Henry gave a Patent to James Elliot and Thomas Alhurst Merchants of Bristol, to John Gonzalez and Francis Fernandez, Natives of Portugal, to go with English Colours in quest of unknown Countries, upon certain terms expressed in the Patent (9).

Elizabeth, Henry's Queen, died the 11th of February 1503, without being much lamented by the King, who never loved her (10). On the contrary, he had given her sensible mortifications. His hatred to the House of York, was extended to his own Wife, especially as he always deemed her a dangerous Rival. The concern he gave her by confining the Queen her Mother in a Convent, and confiscating all her Estate, plainly showed his little regard for her (11).

At this time, the King's affairs were so prosperous, that he seemed to have all he could desire. He was in peace with all the Princes of Europe, and without troubles at home, or the appearance of any thing to vex or embarrass him. But his Subjects were not the happier. As his Avarice was insatiable, he was continually seeking new ways to heap up Riches, which he wanted not, since it was not to use them, and since never Prince was a greater Oeconomist than himself. His Instruments for this purpose were two infamous Ministers, Sir Richard Empson and Edmund Dudley, who regardless of their own and the King's reputation, fought only to gratify his humour, and devise new means to fill his Cofers. Dudley was of a good Family, well skilled in the Laws of the Land, and able to give a favorable turn to the most odious actions. Empson was sprung from the dregs of the people (12), impudent to the last degree, and so little ashamed of the injustices he committed, that he used to glory in them. These are some of the means they used to draw Money from the people, into the King's Treasury, besides numberless others too long to be recounted.

In the first place, they caused such as were reputed rich, to be indicted of sundry Crimes, and when the Bills were found by the Grand-Jury, committed them, without bringing them to their Tryal, till of themselves they desired to compound with the King. If they delayed too long, the Ministers found means to terrify them by Emillaries, who made them believe their Lives were 1503. in danger. By this means the parties were forced at length to come to a Composition, which tore from them the best part of their Estates, and which the Ministers termed however Mitigations, as if the King had done them a favour in allaying the too great rigour of the Law.

2. They came at last to that point, that they proceeded without observing any form of Justice. They sent forth their Precepts to attach and cite people before themselves, at their own, private Houses, in a Court of Commifion, and there, after a summary proceeding by examination, without proofs or witnesses, passed Sentence, and condemned them in large Fines to the King's use. Thus without vouchsafing to make use of Juries, and the methods prescribed by the Law, they assumed themselves to deal as well in Controversies Civil, as in Pleas of the Crown. One would have thought, all Criminal Causes had belonged to that kind of Jurisdiction, which having been very rare in the foregoing Reigns, was grown common in this.

3. They charged the Subjects Lands with Tenures in Capite, by finding false Offices (1), refusing upon divers pretences and delays to admit people to traverse those false Offices according to Law. Hence they formed variety of Processes, whereof they themselves were the Judges, and which were always decided in favour of the Crown.

4. When the King's Wards had accomplished their full Age, they could never have Livery of their Lands without paying excessive Fines, contrary to the express Tenor of Magna Charta (2).

5. When Men were 'out-lawed in personal actions, the Ministers would not permit them to purchase their Charters of Pardon, unless they paid great and intolerable Sums; standing upon the rigour of the Law, which upon Out-lawries gives forfeiture of Goods. Nay, contrary to all Law and Colour, they maintained, the King ought to have the half of Men's Lands and Rents during two whole years.

6. They would also threaten the Jurors, and force them to find as they should direct; and if they refused to act so unjustly, they were cited, imprisoned, and fined (3).

It is needless to repeat any more of their courses. These I have mentioned are sufficient to show, that Men of this character scrupled not to commit the most enormous Injustices, provided it was for the King's advantage. Herein less blameable than the King himself, who suffered them to abuse thus his Name and Authority.

We do not find in the Life of this Monarch, that he ever exercised one act of Grace in point of Fines or Confiscations. On the contrary, he was always inflexible, even with regard to his most faithful Servants. His Historian relates a very remarkable particular, which serves to discover plainly the Character of this Prince. Of all the Lords of the Kingdom, he had the most confidence in the Earl of Oxford, who had indeed done him the greatest Services, as well in war as in peace. One day, the King went to visit him at his Castle [at Henningham] and was entertained with all possible Magnificence. When the King was ready to depart, he saw a great number of men dressed in rich Liveries, and ranged on both Sides to make him a lane. The Earl it seems had forgot, that it was forbid by several Acts of Parliament, to give Liveries, as was observed, to any but menial Servants, but the King remembered it. Wherefore turning to the Earl, he said, My Lord, I have heard much of your Magnificence and Hospitality; but I find they exceed all report. These band-some Gentlemen and Yeomen I see on both Sides of me, are sure your menial Servants. The Earl, not perceiving the King's aim, smiled and answered, he did not keep so many Domesticks, but these people were only his Retainers, come to do him Service on such extraordinary occasions. The King startled a little, and said, By my Faith, my Lord, I thank you for your good Cheer; but I must not suffer to have my Laws broken before my face. My Attorney must talk with you. The Historian adds, this Trespass cost the Earl fifteen thousand Marks (4).

The same Historian says, he had seen a Book of Accounts of Emphysen's, with the King's hand almost to every leaf, by way of Signing, and was in some places postilled in the margin with the King's hand likewise, where among many others was this Memorandum:

Item, Received of such a one, five Marks for the Pardon to be procured, and if the Pardon do not pass, the Money to be repaid; except the party be some other way satisfied. And over against this memorandum of the King's own hand, was written by him in the Margin, Otherwise Satisfied. He was unwilling to pardon the Man, and yet could not resolve to restore the five Marks. Hence it is plain he did not neglect small profits.

It is easy to guess, the King's and the Ministry's Conduct bred great discontent and murmurs among the people. The great Men themselves meeting with no better quarter than the meanest, groaned under the oppression of Emphysen and Dudley, two Leaches, who spared neither friend nor foe. The Earl of Suffolk whom the King had lately pardoned, fancied, these discontents would raise in the end some violent storm against the King, if the people could find a person of distinction to head them. As he was of the House of Tork by his Mother, he imagined, the time was come to prosecute his Rights, and the people would not fail to declare for him. In this belief he persuaded several Lords and Gentlemen to promise to support him at a proper Season, and then retired into Flanders, from whence he made his Friends expect a powerful aid by means of the Duchies of Burgundy (5).

The King, surprized at the Earl of Suffolk's retreat, did not question that he had contrived some plot in England before his departure, and had his Accomplices. To be fully informed, he believed the best way was to recur to the same arts, he had used with respect to Perkin Warbeck. To that end, he sent orders to Sir Robert Curson Governor of the Castle of Hammes near Calais, whom he knew to be fit for his purpose, and entirely at his devotion. Pursuant to his Instructions, Curson relinquishing his Government, under colour of some affront designedly put upon him by the King, came to the Earl of Suffolk with offers of his Service. He played his part so well, that the Earl imparted to him all his Secrets. By this means the King came to know, that William Courtney Earl of Devonshire (6), married to Catherine, Edward the Fourth's Daughter, William de la Pole, Brother of the Earl of Suffolk, Sir James Tyrrel, Sir John Windham, and several other meaner persons, were concerned in the plot. They were all apprehended in one day (7). But as probably, there was not sufficient Evidence against the two first, the King was contented with detaining them in prison. This gave occasion to think they were not guilty, but that the King used this pretence to secure them, because their relation to the House of Tork made him uneasy. As for Tyrrel, against whom the Blood of Edward V. and the Duke of Tork cried for vengeance, he was beheaded (8) with Windham his Accomplice. The rest of inferior rank suffered the punishment of Traitors.

Mean while, Henry desiring to be better informed of the Earl of Suffolk's Secrets, took care to preserve Curson's use an extraordinary method. He caused Innocent VIII's Bull of Excommunication, to be published at Paul's-Cross, against all persons that should disturb him in the possession of the Throne, and particularly against the Earl of Suffolk and Sir Robert Curson. But when he had drawn from the Earl all his Secrets, he returned into England, where he was graciously received by the King, but the people looking upon him with horror, loaded him with curses. The Earl of Suffolk being confounded by Curson's flight, roved about for some time in Germany, and at length returned into Flanders, where the Archduke, notwithstanding his Treaties with Henry, took him into his protection.

The King knowing the Earl had not in England a party capable to support him, showed no farther uneasiness. Another affair troubled him much more. He had now received a hundred thousand Crowns of Gold, in part of the portion of the Princess of Wales his Daughter-in-law, Arthur's Widow. As that Prince died without Issue, he must either send back the Widow to Spain, and consequently return the hundred thousand Crowns, or if he kept her in England, give her the third part of the Principality of Wales (9), which was settled upon her. Both were equally grievous to a Prince of Henry's Temper. However, he could not dispense with one or other, without breaking with Ferdinand, which did not agree with 1503.² his present circumstances. For indeed, the deference paid him by all the other Princes, and particularly by the King of France, was properly owing to his strict Alliance with the Spanish Monarch. In this perplexity, he thought of a very proper expedient to preserve the friendship of Ferdinand, with the Sum already received, and procure him the other hundred thousand Crowns which remained to be paid. And that was to marry Catherine to his Son Henry, now Prince of Wales, by the death of his elder Brother. The proposal being made to the King and Queen of Spain, they agreed to it, on condition the Pope's Dispensation was first obtained. This was the subject of an agreement between the two Crowns, the 23d of June, without a particular mention of the Articles of the intended Marriage. It must be observed, that in this agreement, it was alleged, as a necessary reason for demanding the Dispensation, not only that Arthur and Henry were Brothers, but moreover that Arthur's Marriage with Catherine was duly solemnized and consummated.

tive was to demand a Subsidy for his eldest Daughter's Dowry. The Custom of demanding money on such occasions was too advantageous to the King to suffer it to be abolished. The Queen of Scotland's portion was but thirty thousand Nobles (4), but this Subsidy granted by the Parliament may well be thought to be much more considerable, besides a handsome present made him by the Clergy on the same account. So, instead of emptying his Coffers by the marriage of his Daughter, he filled them the fuller. Nothing shows more the almost absolute power of the King, than the choice of Dudley for Speaker of the House of Commons (5). He was the most generally hated person in the Kingdom, except Empson his associate, who was as odious as himself. Wherefore it must be that the fear of displeasing the King, by rejecting the Person he recommended, led the Commons to that choice.

Bacon. Dudley Speaker of the House of Commons. Bacon.

The Subsidy was not the only thing, the King politically turned to his advantage in this Parliament. He found means to obtain Acts which seemed to aim wholly at the good of the publick, but in reality tended only to procure him money. For instance, all Patents of Lease or Grant were disannulled to such as came not [upon lawful Summons] to serve the King against the Rebels (6). As the number of Delinquents in this respect was very great, this act was a fertile source of treasure to the King, by reason they were obliged to renew their Leases and Grants, which could be done only upon very hard terms.

Advantage of Statutes for the King. Bacon.

Another Statute made all sorts of clipped or impaired Coins of Silver not to be current in payments, without suffering them even to pass for the value of their weight. As there were scarce any other in the Kingdom, every one was forced to bring in his ready money to the Mint, in order to be new coined, by which the King was a very considerable gainer.

The Statute against giving Liveries to any but menial Servants, was also revived, from whence Empson and Dudley had an opportunity to attack many Persons (7).

Thus the King continually amassing without being obliged to any extraordinary charge, at a time when his ordinary expences were very moderate, and husbanded in the best manner possible, could not but be extremely rich in ready money. But then he doubly ruined his Subjects; first by draining their purses; and secondly by hindering the coin, of which he had great quantities in his Coffers, from circulating in Trade. On the other hand, Empson and Dudley continued their extortions without any reserve, and with a rigor unexperienced by the English, under any of their former Kings.

About this time Henry had thoughts of canonizing Henry VI, the last King of the House of Lancaster. But there were two grand obstacles. The first, that the Miracles ascribed to that Prince since his death were not well attested, and the actions of his life, which were of tentatiously displayed, showed rather his weakness than sanctity. But the second difficulty, that is the necessary charges of this canonization quite frustrated the project. As this is an act of grace and favour, the Pope generally proportions the expences not to the Person of the Saint himself, but to the riches of him that solicits the canonization. The King even perceived, that the Court of Rome's questioning Henry the Sixth's sanctity, tended only to magnify the favour, and enhance the price accordingly. This was sufficient to cause him to desist from his intention. So avaricious a Prince could hardly resolve to empty his Coffers for so needless a thing, and which, at most, would have procured him only the praises of the Lancastrians. He was contented therefore to obtain a Bull for the removal of Henry VI's Body to Westminster among his Ancestors (8). He was obscurely buried at first in Chertsey Monastery near London, from whence he was removed to Windsor.

The King thinks of canonizing Henry VI, but drops the. Bacon.

What give occasion to this Law, was, that many Peasants went about the Kingdom privately, buying Pewter and Brass, which encouraged wicked People to steal Drums, Plates, &c. knowing they had Receivers for them. 2. It was ordained, That no Bodies corporate make any Acts or Ordinances, but what are examined and approved by the Chancellor, Treasurer of England, Chief Justice, of either Bench, or Justices of Assize, upon pain of forfeiting fifty Pounds. 3. That no Person entered in a Riot, shall forfeit twenty Pounds, and be imprisoned. 4. That no Person bring, or cause to be brought into the Realm, to be sold, any manner of Silk wrought by itself, or with any other Stuff, upon pain of forfeiting the same. See Stat. 16 Hen. VII.

(8) At the same time the Pope sent a Bull, wherein he ordered, That Traitors and Rebels, who had taken Sanctuary, should be carefully watched, so as not to be suffered to escape; and if they did, they should be then delivered to him. Rymer. 2d. Tom. 13. p. 104.

1504. had injured, or designed only to blind People's eyes by this act of justice. The first would be most probable, if from this time he had put a stop to the exactions of Empson and Dudley. But it is difficult to believe that, whilst he suffered his Subjects to be oppressed by these Ministers, he really intended to do justice to all the World.

Isabella Queen of Castile dying the 26th of November, Ferdinand her Spouse writ the same day to Henry to give him notice thereof. He told him in his Letter, that the deceased Queen had appointed him in her Will Administrator of the Kingdom of Castile, for Jane their Daughter, Wife of the Archduke of Austria, and who by the death of the Queen her Mother was become Queen of Castile.

When the Archduke received the news of Isabella's death, he was employed in making War upon the Duke of Geldres. This War preventing him from repairing into Spain so soon as he could have wished, he was obliged to leave to King Ferdinand his Father-in-law the Government of Castile, fully bent however to take it from him as soon as possible. On the other hand, Ferdinand improving Isabella's Will, pretended to keep the Administration of that Kingdom during his life, probably, because the deceased Queen had not limited the continuance.

This dispute bred some uneasiness in Henry, whose case was the same with Ferdinand's, in the opinion of many people. He was not ignorant that most of his Subjects were perfwaded, Elizabeth his Spouse had been of right the true Queen of England, and consequently the Crown was fallen after her decease to Henry her Son and lawful Successor. Though he affected to hold for certain, that the House of York had never any right to the Crown, he was however very uneasy, because in general the English were of another opinion. It is true, that besides his descent from the House of Lancaster, he founded his right upon two other titles; namely, Conquest, and the approbation of Parliament. But he perceived how weak these two foundations would prove, should the House of York, by some revolution come to gain ground. Upon this account, he was very attentive to what passed in Spain, looking upon the decision of this contest as a precedent for or against him. On the other hand, he was afraid that Philip, who had appeared for some time closely united with Lewis XII. would join in a League with that Monarch and the Emperor, to oblige Ferdinand to resign him Castile. In that case he forelaw, he should be forced either to abandon Ferdinand to these three potent enemies, or enter into a War with them to support him. Both were equally opposite to his interests. In fine, he had cast his eyes upon the Queen Dowager of Naples, Widow of King Ferdinand, for a Wife, in order to enjoy the large Dowry assigned her in that Kingdom. Perhaps he hoped by marrying that Queen, to render himself umpire of the differences between Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, concerning the Kingdom of Naples.

To be fully informed therefore of the disposition of the Castilians, and the qualities of the Queen of Naples, he sent three Persons into Italy and Spain, not as Ambassadors, but as travellers for their pleasure (1). However, to procure them access to the Queen of Naples and Ferdinand, he so ordered, that the Princess of Wales gave them Letters both for the King her Father and the young Queen. These Gentlemen's private instructions, with respect to the Queen, were very particular. The King wanted to be exactly informed of her age, complexion, stature, health, temper, inclinations, behaviour and estate. This shows he was not willing lightly to resolve. But the project vanished when the King heard from his Envoys, that indeed the Queen's jointure was very considerable; but had been changed by Ferdinand, since he was possessed of the Kingdom of Naples into a pension for life.

When the Gentlemen arrived in Spain, the contest between Ferdinand and Philip his Son-in-law was still in the same state. They therefore acquainted the King, that Ferdinand continued to govern Castile as Administrator; and even hoped to persuade Philip to leave him the Administration freely during life, both by means of some of his Council whom he had gained, and by threatening him to marry again, and so give an Heir to the Kingdom of Aragon: That therefore, there was a project of marriage between Ferdinand and Germaine de Foix, which would be certainly accomplished, in case Philip molested the King his Father-in-law. They informed him moreover, that Ferdinand's Secretary had discovered to them, as a great secret, that the marriage of Prince Charles of Austria with Claude of France would not take effect, because Lewis XII. was resolved to give his Daughter to Francis Duke of Angoulême his presumptive Heir. That then, on supposition that Philip would remain in the Low-Countries with his Queen, Ferdinand intended to demand Mary the King's second Daughter for the young Prince of Austria. These informations containing nothing certain, Henry could take no measures, till he saw the course of the Spanish affairs.

Whilst Ferdinand and Philip were in Treaty concerning their difference, Philip and Jane were proclaimed King and Queen of Castile at Brussels; which showed, they intended not to resign for ever the Administration of Castile to Ferdinand, as he had flattered himself. Meanwhile, the War of Geldres, and Queen Jane's being near her time, hindered them from executing their resolution of going to Castile. They knew, the Castilians were not pleased with Ferdinand, and did not doubt that as soon as they appeared, all would declare for them. For the same reason, Ferdinand used all sorts of artifices to disengage them from this Voyage.

In the mean while, Margaret of Austria, Philip's Sister, lost her Spouse the Duke of Savoy, who died the 10th of September. Some days after the new Queen of Castile was delivered of a Princess who was called Mary, and was afterwards Queen of Hungary.

This year was very barren of remarkable events with regard to England. Besides what has been related, we find only a Treaty of Alliance between Henry and George Duke of Saxony, Hereditary Governour of Frisle, to whom Henry had sent Ambassadors (2) ever since February. This Treaty was concluded the 30th of December.

The War of Geldres being ended, and Queen Jane able to travel, Philip resolved to carry her into Castile, and knowing it to be the only way to secure the Government of that Kingdom. Though they intended to go by Sea, they chose the Winter, it seems, to surprize Ferdinand, who probably, would not expect them at that Season. They departed the 10th of January under a strong Convoy prepared for that purpose. But before they got out of the Channel, a terrible storm (3) dispersed their Fleet, and the Ship on which they were, with much difficulty ran into Weymouth (4) in England, having been in great danger. The King and Queen were so fatigued and sick, that contrary to the opinion of their Council they would land to refresh their Spirits.

Mean while the People of the Country seeing a numerous Fleet, were very much alarmed. They immediately ran to their Arms, and Sir Thomas Trenchard at the head of some Troops marched to Weymouth (5), to concert measures with the Inhabitants in case of an Invasion. When he heard, the King and Queen of Castile were landed, he waited upon them, humbly inviting them to his House, till the King was informed of their arrival. Philip would have gladly re-embarked, but perceived he should not be suffered till the King's orders were received, to whom an express was dispatched. So, without much intreaty he consented to stay till that time.

As soon as Henry had notice of the King and Queen of Castile's arrival, he sent the Earl of Arundel (6) with his Compliments, and to tell them, he would make all possible haste to come and embrace them. The Earl withal assured them from the King, that they were as much master in his Dominions as himself. Philip finding there was no avoiding the King's visit, believed he should gain time by going to him. To that end, he posted to Windsor (7), whilst his Queen followed by easy Journeys. Henry received them both with all imaginable marks of Friendship, but however, ruminating all the while, how to reap some advantage from the accident which had thrown them into his Dominions (8).

Some days after, he intimated to Philip, that as his condition was altered, it would be proper to renew their Treaty of Commerce, to which Philip agreed, though the reason alleged by Henry was of no force. For Philip, by being King of Castile, was not less Sovereign of

1506. the Low-Countries, the first Dignity causing no alteration in the last. But Henry had his aim, and Philip plainly perceived, that being in his power, he ought carefully to avoid all occasions of offending him, lest he should find some pretence to detain him in England. He was not ignorant of the strict Union between Henry and Ferdinand, and was under some apprehensions, that Henry would think of obstructing his Voyage, to oblige his Father-in-law. However this be, the Treaty was renewed, but with some alterations to the advantage of the English. Amongst other things, an Article of the old Treaty was suppressed, which permitted Philip's Subjects to fish on the Coasts of England. This made the Inhabitants of the Low-Countries call it Interceptus Moliis, or the bad Treaty.

This affair being finished, Henry opened his mind to Philip concerning his design to marry Margaret his Sister, Widow of the Duke of Savoy (1). Philip seemed very well pleased with the proposal. And indeed, nothing could be more for his advantage than to make Henry his friend by this Alliance, lest he should openly espouse the King of Aragon's quarrel. So, the Marriage was concluded at Windsor, the 20th of March (2). By the Articles agreed by both, Philip promised to give the Duchess his Sister, three hundred thousand Crowns [of French Gold] (3), with a yearly pension of three thousand eight hundred and fifty. Mean while, Henry fearing Philip would go from his word, when he was out of his power, caused to be inserted in the Treaty, that the principal Lords of the Low-Countries should swear, they would use their utmost endeavours to procure the accomplishment of this Marriage. The Oaths of several of the Lords, in pursuance of this Article, are to be seen in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

Henry had one thing more to obtain of Philip, without which he could not think of letting him go, though outwardly he continued to caress him. And that was, to deliver to him the Earl of Suffolk, who was then in Flanders. But at the first overture, Philip told him plainly, he could not comply with his request, being bound in honour not to sacrifice a Lord whom he had taken under his protection; that besides, it would be dishonourable to himself, since the World would not fail to say, he was used as a prisoner. Henry, who little regarded what the World said, provided he obtained his ends, replied, he would take all the dishonour upon himself. This answer threw Philip into great Perplexity. He was unwilling to betray the Earl of Suffolk, after promise to protect him. But on the other hand, he perceived Henry was bent upon having that Lord at any rate, and had in his hands an infallible means to obtain him. Besides, in the present posture of his affairs, not being yet certain, whether he should not be forced to go to war with his Father-in-law, it was easy to foresee, he might stand in need of the King of England, and consequently it would be very wrong to disoblige him. Wherefore, he suddenly came to a resolution, and with an air of Confidence spoke in this manner: Sirs, since you are pleased to give Law to me, permit me to do as I please to you. I will deliver the Earl, but you shall give me your honour not to touch his Life. Henry agreeing to this condition, Philip desired the thing might be done in a manner honourable for both. I will so order it, added he, that the Earl shall come to England of our own accord, by which it will appear that I have solicited and obtained his Pardon, and that you were very ready to grant it. Henry approving the expedient, the Earl of Suffolk willingly accepted the offer made him (4). Mean while, Henry being desirous to have the Earl in his power before Philip's departure, continued his entertainments and diversions, on pretence of doing honour to the King and Queen of Castile, but in reality, to gain time till the Earl's arrival. He admitted Philip to the Order of the Garter, and Philip made the Prince of Wales, Knight of the Golden-Fleece. After that, Henry carried his Guests to London, where they were magnificently entertained. Shortly after, the Earl of Suffolk came from Flanders, and was conveyed to the Tower. Thus, Henry under colour of doing him honour, kept Philip in England above three months, till he had obtained his desires (5). In all appearance, Philip saw plainly, through all the Careless he received, that it was not in his power to desert when he pleased. Else, it is not likely, as he intended, to sail into Spain in January, he would have willingly staid in England to the end of April, or the beginning of May.

When Philip and Jane were in Castile, the people showed so great affection for them, that Ferdinand could easily see, his endeavours to keep the Government of the Kingdom would be vain. Accordingly, without inflicting any more upon his Affinity that ship, which could take place only in the Queen's Daughter's absence, he withdrew into his own Realm of Aragon. Afterwards, he made a Voyage to Naples, where Garzetti his General began to make him uneasy, and thereby Philip and Jane remained, though not long, in possession of Castile. Within a few months, Philip was seized with a Distemper, of which he died the 25th of September. He left the Government of his Son Charles to Lewis XII, who appointed the Lord de Chivores for his Governor. This choice, which was generally approved, and was a clear evidence of Lewis's Sincerity and Disinterestedness, proved fatal to France, as the Governor made his Pupil more amiable than was necessary for the good of the Kingdom.

The death of Philip so affected his Queen, that she lost her reason, and became entirely incapable of governing the State. Whereupon Ferdinand her Father retained the administration of affairs, which he had seen deprived of but five months. He is said to take no great care of the Queen's care, lest recovering her Senses, she should send him back again to Aragon.

The disinterestedness, shown by Lewis XII, with respect to the young Archduke Prince of Spain, did not hold long. He was promised to give him Charles his eldest Daughter in Marriage, but thought it more proper to marry her to Francis Duke of Angoulême his presumptive Successor. Moreover, being apprehensive of a League against him, between the Emperor, the Archduke, and Ferdinand, and that the King of England might come into it also, he endeavoured to embroil young Charles's affairs, by exciting the Duke of Guelders to renew the war.

The Archduke being too young to govern, the Flemings played the Emperor his Grandfather to take the Administration in his Grandson's name. Moreover, they sent their request, and till he could come himself, sent their Margaret his Daughter, Widow of the Duke of Savoy.

Upon that Prince's arrival at Brussels, he concluded with Henry a provisional Treaty of Commerce, till some differences caused by the late Treaty between the Merchants of both Nations could be adjusted. This Treaty was signed at Bruges, the 5th of June.

The same Ambassadors that were assembled at Calais, spent there the rest of the year, in treating of the Marriage of Charles Archduke of Austria, Sovereign of the Low-Countries, and Prince of Castile, with Mary, Henry's second Daughter (6). At length, on the 21st of December, they signed a Treaty, that Charles should marry the Princess Mary, as soon as he was fourteen years old, and that her portion should be two hundred and fifty thousand Crowns of Gold (7). The young Prince ran the hazard of losing the Kingdom of Aragon, Valencia, Grenada, and the Principality of Catalonia, his Grandfather Ferdinand having married Germaine de Foix. But happily for him, they had no Children.

Though Henry's Coifers were full, he was not weary of heaping up Money. We have seen, that in the year 1504, the Parliament gave him a Subsidy for the Marriage of the Queen of Scotland his Daughter. But the year was not expired before he issued out a Proclamation to levy a Benevolence, by his own Authority, and without any apparent necessity; so that this Conduct could be ascribed only to his insatiable desire of hoarding up Money (8). He was grown to absolute in his Kingdom, that no Man durst oppose his will, or even shew the least discontent. Mean while, Empson and Dudley continued their Extortions and Oppressions with all imaginable rigour. This very year 1507, they sharply prosecuted the Mayor of London (9), for neglecting to bring to justice a 1507. Coiner of false Money, and because he would not, or could not pay an exorbitant Fine, sent him to the Tower. The Sheriffs, Aldermen, and all that had borne any office in the City, were questioned and prosecuted with the same rigour, and compelled to pay to the King Fines, proportioned not to their Abilities, but to the King's and his Ministers rapacioufness (1).

While the King was wholly intent upon heaping up riches, he found himself frequently seized with the Gout. At first he disregarded it, as not believing it dangerous. But by degrees the humour falling upon his Lungs, it turned to a Pittick, which made him perceive he had not long to live. He suffered however his two Ministers to continue their exactions without any respect of persons. He was so charmed to see his Coffers full of Gold and Silver, that he could not resolve to put a stop to the financial proceedings which daily brought him in fresh Sums. He is said to have amassed eighteen hundred thousand pounds Sterling. This Sum will appear prodigious, if 'tis considered that Money was then much scarcer in Europe than at present. He laid up his Treasures under his own key and keeping, in secret places at Richmond (2).

1508. As the Marriage of the Princess Mary with the Archduke was then the only considerable affair Henry was employed in, he spent the whole year 1508 in taking measures to secure its accomplishment. The Acts of this year, in the Calendar, scarce regard any other affair. At length, on the 17th of December, the Marriage was accomplished per verba de Presenti, the Lord de Berghes being the young Prince's Proxy. As such, he espoused the Princess, gave her a Ring, and saluted her publicly in the name of the Prince her Spouse (3).

About the same time, the Archduke pawned to the King a Jewel called the rich Fleur-de-luce (4), for the Sum of fifty thousand Crowns. The Emperor as Grandfather and Guardian of Charles, approved of the Marriage and Loan. In all likelihood, the Money was borrowed for him. He had occasion for it to make a figure in the League of Cambray, which he had concluded this year, with the Pope and the King of France, against the Venetians, who were become formidable to all Italy.

As to Henry's Marriage with Margaret of Austria, tho' it was concluded in 1506, it was no more thought of, after that Monarch, fallen into a Pittick, perceived he was fitter to think of death than a wife.

The King finding he daily grew worse was pleased to prepare for death, by granting a general Pardon. He discharged likewise, with his own Money, all Prisoners about London that lay for Fees or Debts, under forty Shillings. Then he made his Will, ordering that his Heir should make Restitution of whatever his Officers and Ministers had unjustly taken from his Subjects. But this remorse came too late. As he could not resolve to make this restitution in his Life-time, the Prince his Son thought not proper to part with the Money amassed by the King his Father. He died at Richmond the 22d of April 1509, having lived two and fifty years, and reigned three and twenty and eight months. His death is said to happen very seasonably, for had he lived much longer, the Prince his Son, now in his seventeenth year, might not have had patience to wait till his Father's death put him in possession of the Throne. In that case, he might have supported himself with the Queen his Mother's Title, Heiress of the House of York, and pretended that the King his Father reigned only in right of his Queen. This pretension would have been capable of reviving the old quarrel, and rekindling a Civil War in the Kingdom. But the King's death removed the fears of the English.

Henry VII had three Sons (5) and four Daughters. Arthur his eldest, as was observed, died in his seventeenth year. Henry his second, succeeded him, and Edmund his third died at the age of five years. Of his four Daughters, two died in their childhood (6), and the other two, Margaret and Mary, are sufficiently known by what has been said.

If the History of this reign be read with never so little attention, it will easily be perceived, that Henry's views were but two. The first was to keep the Crown, acquired by extraordinary good fortune, and perhaps un-thought of, before he was invited into England by the Duke of Buckingham. The other was, to accumulate riches. As he never suffered himself to be diverted by other thoughts, his whole application centered upon one single object, namely, upon thoroughly examining every thing that could have any relation to the two ends he had proposed. Ambition, Honour, Glory, Love, Pleasures, and all the other passions which generally disquiet the hearts of Princes, made but little Impression upon him. Content with enjoying his Crown, he thought neither of new acquisitions, nor of rendering his name illustrious by great actions. All his thoughts were confined to prevent or defeat the designs of his domestic Enemies, or to well fill his Coffers. He had a wonderful Sagacity, to discover in the affairs that occurred, the side from whence some advantage could be drawn. This is what he plainly shewed in the affair of Bretagne, in his pretended wars with France and Scotland, and even in his domestic troubles, which by his address, turned all to his profit (7).

Though he was sometimes forced to take arms, never Prince loved peace more than he (8). As he had no ambition, he saw no advantage for him in War. On the contrary, he considered that all the events of a War, whether foreign or domestic, were against him. The former could at most but procure him some glory and acquisitions abroad, of which he was not very fond; and by the latter he might be a great loser. Besides, a time of commotions allowed no opportunities to accumulate riches. So, laying down this fixed principle of his policy, not to engage in any War without an absolute necessity, he never swerved from it. It is this that made him unconcernedly behold the loss of Bretagne, and without resentment suffer the insults of the King of Scotland, because it was not from the War that he intended to reap any advantage, but only from the preparations that were to be made to support it. However, this policy would have been unfeasible when he was attacked by domestic enemies, whose aim was to rob him of his Crown. As his all was then at stake, he cheerfully faced the danger, though with all the precautions possible not to run any hazard. He won two Battles upon the Rebels, one at Stoke, the other at Black-Heath. But in both he was very superior in number of Troops, and fought against Persons ill-armed and unskilled in the art of War. So, it cannot be said what he would have done, had he been opposed with equal Forces. It is no less difficult to know, whether it was owing to his courage that he headed his Armies in Person, or to his distrust of those that served him. However this be, he was always fortunate in his domestic Wars, and thereby gained a great reputation, that all the Princes of Europe earnestly courted his Alliance. On the other hand, the esteem Foreigners expressed for him, did not a little contribute to render him formidable to his Subjects. I say, formidable, for it is certain, he was never beloved. In a word, his method of governing, which approached to arbitrary power, especially towards the end of his reign, his insatiable avarice, his haughtiness, his pride, and his dark and reserved temper, were no proper qualities to win the affection of his People.

He never opened his mind to any man, except perhaps to one or two of his Ministers. As for the rest, he let them to work without their knowing themselves the motives of their own proceedings. The World was so persuaded, he had always some hidden design even in his most indifferent actions, that what was only a pure effect of chance, was often ascribed to his policy.

His Spies in foreign Courts gave him an extensive knowledge of all that passed there. On the other hand, his Ambassadors were always charged to inform themselves by all sorts of ways, of the secrets of the Princes to whom they were sent. Very often this was the principal article of their instructions. By this means he made such discoveries as enabled him to convince the foreign Ministers residing at his Court, of his great insight into their Master's affairs. Hence he reaped many considerable advantages, chiefly in that the Princes of Europe fearing his abilities, were very forward to live in good understanding with him. His strict friendship with Ferdinand King of

The STATE of the CHURCH of the Fifteenth Century.

State of the Church
in the sixteenth Century.

THE Christian Church had never been in so deplorable a state as in the XVth Century. God's Justice and Mercy, and Christ's meritorious death, were scarce any more the object of a Christian's Faith. Most people's religion consisted in Pilgrimages, and the worship of the blessed Virgin, Saints and Relicks. As for the Clergy, their whole care was confined to the supporting themselves in that height of Grandeur and Power they had enjoyed for several Centuries, and to the seeing that no Man presumed to dispute their Immunities. Discipline was never more remiss. The Clergy seemed to look upon their Spiritual Power and Jurisdiction, only as a means to prevent the violation of their Temporal Privileges. Provided their rights were untouched, every one might do what seemed good in his own eyes. The authority of the Church was become the capital point of Religion.

The Papal power had strangely increased every Century, each Pope having made it his business to enlarge it as much as possible. They were come at length to dispose of all the Church-Preferments in Christendom, and to be the supreme Judges in all Causes Ecclesiastical. National Synods were no longer held. And indeed, of what use would they have been, since the Court of Rome claimed the Cognizance of all Church-matters? In a word, the Pope was become the Centre of Religion, to which every thing was to tend. The privileges of Churches, the prerogatives of Sovereigns, were all annulled by the Non-obstante Clause, usually inserted in every Bull. But it was not only over Spirituals that the Popes had stretched their authority; they pretended also to extend it over Temporals, under colour that Religion was concerned in all affairs. Kings themselves were not out of their reach. In all the Marriages of Princes there was occasion for the Pope's Dispensation: Neither Peace nor Truce of any moment was concluded without the Pope's mediation or guaranty. Some Popes were seen to carry their pretensions so far, as to enjoin Peaces or Truces without the consent of the parties. In short, it is extremely probable, they would have wholly engrossed the Temporal Power as well as the Spiritual, if the Schisms of the XVth Century had not caused them to lose ground. The Revolutions of the following Century made them lose still more. However this be, the Popes were become real Sovereigns, not only with respect to the power they had assumed, but also with regard to the immense riches, which through numberless Channels flowed into the vast Ocean of the Apostolick Chamber. Tithes, First-fruits, Taxes for the service of the Chamber, Dispensations for all sorts of Cases, as well contrary to the Law of God, as to the Canons of the Church, Subsidies exacted from time to time from the Clergy, for the occasions of the Holy See, Crusades, Benefices which are seldom bestowed without a previous bargain with the Apostolick Chamber; in a word, Simony openly practised by many Popes, some of whom were accused and convicted, were inexhaustible Fountains which maintained the Affluence and Luxury of the Court of Rome. It was almost impossible, that purity of Life and true religious Principles should be preserved undefiled, amidst so much Grandeur and Riches. On the contrary, the Popes were the more liable to make an ill use of their power, as most of them were not born for so high a Station. Accordingly we find in History, that Rome and Aragon were the Centre of Pride, Avarice, Luxury, Sensuality, and all the most scandalous Vices. The Popes were neither learned nor religious. Hardly was there one to be found that might pass for an honest Man, even according to the maxims of the world. And yet, all the preambles of their Bulls were only expressions of their Zeal, their Charity, their Humility, their Justice; whilst for the most part what they enjoined was an authentick proof of their Pride and Tyranny. This is no aggravation, for the Authors who write before the Reformation, have said a hundred times more. Nay, it has even been publicly preached before the Councils.

It may be easily imagined, that such Popes did not take much care to fill, what they called the sacred College, with persons truly pious and devout. It is true, during this Century, there were Cardinals of great repute, and eminent for their Wit, their Eloquence, their political Virtues, and their capacity for temporal Affairs. But these, for the most part, were men governed by the maxims of the world, and who considered Religion but as a means to establish their fortune. The Legates, sent to the several States of Christendom, were so many incendiaries, who fought only to sow discord and division among Princes, or excite them to shed the blood of their own Subjects. In a word, they regarded only the Interest of their master and the Roman See, making no Conscience to violate all the rules of Religion and Equity, to accomplish their ends.

The rest of the Clergy in general were not better. Most of the Bishops were promoted to the Episcopacy, purely for having rendered themselves commendable by their attachment to the Interests of the Court of Rome, or for their services to Princes in their temporal concerns. They were persons educated at Court, and instructed in the maxims of the world. Cruelty, Injustice, Dishonesty, were but too common among them. Nay, they were considered as so many Virtues, when employed in the persecution of such as were termed Heretics, especially of those that dared to contest any of the Pope's or the Clergy's pretended rights.

As for real Learning, it was scarce heard of in this Century. School-Divinity, and the knowledge of the Canon-Law made the whole merit of the Ecclesiastics. It was the only thing by which they could hope to arrive at Church-Dignities. On the other Land, the Monks, who were crept into most of the Professions in the Universities, had overwhelmed Divinity and Philosophy with such a heap of jargon, as served only to give their Disciples false notions of Learning, and teach them to wrangle.

Such was in general the state of the Church in the Century we are speaking of. As for the Civil Affairs of Europe, they were in this and the following Centuries, as in the foregoing. The Sovereigns divided among themselves by their different Interests, thought only of supplanting one another, and making their neighbour's loss turn to their own gain. This drew them into bloody wars, which rendered their people miserable, and suffered neither Princes nor Subjects to attend to the breaches in the Church, or think of means to heal them. Corruption was so great in the world, and in the Church, that God seemed to have abandoned Men to a reprobate Sense, so blind and insensible were they grown. We may add, for the farther representation of the sad estate of the Church, the great progress of the Turks in Europe, during this unfortunate Century. The Greek Empire entirely destroyed, and several other Christian States overrun by the Infidels, were plain tokens of the divine wrath against Christians, to move them to search after the Cause. But instead of seeking the Lord, they persecuted with fire Pennies, Half-pennies, and Farthings. Those old Pennies that bore divers Spurs, or the Mullet betwixt the Bars of the Cross, were to go only for half-pennies. To avoid clipping for the future, the King called new Groats and Two-pences to be coined, having a circle round the outer part; and a dorel, that the Gold hereafter to be coined, should have the whole Scripture, or Inscription, about every Piece. See Shed. 19. R. VI. c. 6. He was the first that after Henry III added the Number to his Name. He left off the Rose that used to surround the King's Head, and in stead thereof, was his Head with a Side Face, which was used before only on the Coins of William Rufus; but was continued by all his Successors, except Henry VI. who was crowned with an archiepiscopal Crown, having this Inscription, HENRIC. VI. DI. GRA. REX. ANG. Z. FR. VIII, and that of Edward VI. and likewise crowned with an archiepiscopal Crown, having this Inscription, EDWARD. VI. DI. GRA. REX. ANG. Z. FR. leaving out on the smaller Monies the Title of Prince. On the Reverse, instead of the three Crowns with the Arms of France and the Pellets, he placed the Arms of France and England quartered, which he the first of our English Monarchs used constantly, but retained the outer Circle and Motto. PONT. DIV. ADIVTORE MEV, except on the small Coins, wherein Unitas was the Place of Coining. Of these, the Pennies exhibit the King on his Kneels upon the Throne, with Crown, Scepter, and Ball; Reverse, the Keys, which discover it to be of the Archbishop's coining. These are the only Pieces that have not the Number, and are inscribed HENRIC. DI. GRA. REX. ANG. In his sixth year, there were some few Shillings coined, and they, being only forty in a Pound of Silver, were fair and large Pieces, a full third heavier than a shilling at this day. They are now almost unknown. Some B. in. H. p.

To accomplish a Reformation in the Church, which was so much wanted, all, or at least the chief Princes of Europe, should have joined their endeavours to promote such a project. But how was it possible, that so many Sovereigns who had Religion so little at heart, should sacrifice their passions to so great a good? Or how could so many different Interests be reconciled? All Europe passionately wished that the Church were reformed. Several Bishops appeared to have the same desire. Nothing was talked of in the Councils, but the Necessity of executing to noble a design. Nay, it seemed, that the Councils of Constance and Basil intended to set about it effectually. But the well-inclined had neither prudence nor resolution enough, to oppose the artifices and violence of the contrary party. We shall feel hereafter, that it was the Popes, the Cardinals, and the principal Clergy who opposed, to their utmost, the projected Reformation, because they were sensible it would prove prejudicial to their temporal Interests. On the other hand, when 'tis considered, with what eagerness and animosity they laboured to root out the pretended Heresies, which combated the temporal Grandeur of the Clergy, no other Inference can be made, than that they themselves perceived the necessity of a Reformation which they would not admit, and that the Fountain of Corruption was in the principal Members of the Clergy, from whence it had but too great an Influence upon the rest.

To represent to the Life the state of the Church of the XVth Century, and let it in its true Light, it would be necessary to give a particular account of what passed at the Councils of Constance and Basil. But this detail would lead me too far. Besides, the History of the first of these Councils is lately published, and writ with that plainness, circumspection, and impartiality, that there is no room to suspect that the Author (1) has suffered himself to be biased by passion or prejudice. The History of the Council of Basil by the same hand, is soon to appear (2). So, referring the Reader to these two Histories, I shall only relate in few words, the most remarkable passages of these Councils. This knowledge will be of use to understand the state of the Church of England, which I shall presently speak of.

Course of Conscience.
L'Entant.*

The Schism, begun in 1378 by Urban VI, and Clement VII, was continued to the beginning of the xvth Century, by Boniface IX, and Benedict XIII, their Successors. Boniface succeeding Urban VI, resided at Rome, and Benedict, Successor of Clement VII, remained at Avignon, where he was kept by the King of France, for fear he should escape before the Schism was ended.

The University of Paris had proposed a method to end this Schism, namely, that the two Popes should resign the Pontificate, which was called the method of Cession. Boniface IX., and Benedict XIII., pretended both to be willing to take this method, for restoring Peace to the Church. But withal, they used so many evasions, that it was costly to see, they had no such desire. And therefore the King of France had thought fit to secure the person of Benedict. This Monarch's illness afterwards placing the Duke of Orleans his Brother at the head of affairs, the young Prince was a great favourer of Benedict XIII., and in 1404, gave him an opportunity to make his escape. This same year Boniface IX. died, and the Cardinals of his party chose Innocent VII., who behaved like his Predecessor, with respect to the Cession. To Innocent, who sat in the Papal Chair but two years, succeeded Angelo Corario, who assumed the name of Gregory XII. Thus the Schism still continued between Gregory and Benedict. These two Popes pretending a desire to end it by the method of Cession, long amused the world with their diffimulation and artifices. In short, the Schism having now lasted thirty years, without any appearance that the two Popes would perform their promise, Gregory XII. saw himself deserted on a sudden by his Cardinals, who retired to Pisa. There remained but four with him. On the other side, France, which was the principal support of Benedict XIII., being tired with his evasions, withdrew from his obedience, and the Pope having lost that protection, went and relied in Spain. But his Cardinals, refusing to follow him, chose to join Gregory's. Presently after, the Cardinals of both parties, with one consent, called a General Council at Pisa, to which most of the Princes of Europe sent their Ambassadors and Prelates.

This Council, held in 1409, deposed the two Popes, and gave the Cardinals leave to choose a new one, who assumed the name of Alexander V. But as Gregory and Benedict did not think themselves lawfully deposed, it happened, that instead of the two Popes before the Council, there were now three.

Alexander V dying in 1410, John XXIII was elected in his room, who called a General Council to meet at Constance in November 1414 (5). This Council found no better way to end the Schism, than by removing the three Popes. John XXIII and Benedict XIII were deposed, and Gregory XII voluntarily resigned the Pontificate. After that, the Council elected Cardinal Odo Colonna, who took the name of Martin V. John XXIII, who was committed to the Custody of the Emperor Sigismund, having made his escape, submitted to Martin V, who honoured him with a Cardinalship. As for Benedict XIII, he still kept the title of Pope, and retiring to the Castle of Renicela, belonging to the Kingdom of Valencia, was suffered by the King of Aragon to live there in quiet. After his death, which happened not till 1424, his Cardinals chose a Canon of Barcelona, who took the name of Clement VIII. But in 1429 he quitted his Dignity in favour of Martin V. Thus ended the Schism at length, after a one and fifty years continuance.

This abstract, though short, will enable us to judge of the character of the Popes, who governed the Church during these fifty years. They were Men who sacrificed the peace and tranquillity of the Church to their own private interests, and damned without mercy, as far as lay in their power, all that were not of their party. They would without scruple have engaged all Christendom in a bloody War for their interests, if the Sovereign Princes had not been wiser than they. Surely, one cannot but form a very melancholy idea of the State of the Church of those days, when it is considered that the Christians of both sides acknowledged for Christ's Vicars, Popes whom they abhorred, and who indeed were so little worthy of the station they enjoyed, that several were deposed for Herefy, Simony, and Perjury.

But I have full one important reflection to make upon the conduct of the Council of Constance, the motive whereof is at first hard to be conceived. If the Council of Pisa was general and lawful, as that of Constance could not forbear owning, why were her decisions not observed? Why was Gregory XII's resignation accepted, a resignation which fuppoted him fill to be Pope notwithstanding his being depofed? Why were terms offered him to induce him to quit the Pontificate? Why was Benedict XIII once more depofed, when he had been already depofed by a general Council? In fhort, why was John XXIII deprived of his dignity, for not keeping his promife to relign the Papacy, fince it could not be queftioned that he was really Pope and his miffion lawful? Was not the authority of the Council of Pifa facrificed by thefe proceedings?

Let it not be objected that John XXIII was not deposed for any defect in his mission, but for his crimes. It is certain, when his promise to resign to the Pontificate was required, it was solely with a view to put an end to the Schism. Had he resigned with a good grace, he would never have been accused, much less condemned for the crime for which he was afterwards deposed. It will be said perhaps, that this inconvenience was not so great as that of perpetuating the Schism. But should the frisking at the authority of a general Council be deemed a slight inconvenience? Did not the Council of Constance give occasion to have her own authority disputed? For, there is no reason why the deposing of Benedict XIII and of John XXIII by the Council of Constance should be more valid, than the deposing the same Benedict XIII and Gregory XII, by the Council of Pisa.

However, through all this intricacy, the motive of the Council of Constance's proceedings is discoverable. The Schism manifestly tended to the dissolution of the Papal dignity, which served for basis and foundation to most of the Clergy's privileges, and to the Hierarchy itself. Castile, Aragon, Navarre, Portugal, had been neutral some years, without owning any of the contending Popes. France had withdrawn her obedience from Benedict XIII., without transferring it to Gregory XII. In a word, the whole World in general began to condemn their excommunications, which they so visibly abused. There was danger therefore that by degrees a Pope would be thought useless, and thereby the foundation of the Hierarchy would have been undermined, and perhaps a new form of Government introduced into the Church. The Cardinals and Prelates of whom the Council of Constance was composed, were so highly concerned to avoid this inconvenience, that they facrificing all to that end, is not surprizing. This is the true reason of their conduct. But they took care to proceed very differently with regard to the pretended Hereticks, who openly contested the privileges of the Clergy. To extirpate a Heresy so prejudicial to them, they made use of Fire and Sword, rather than sacrifice the least of their interests. This is what we are going to see in the manner they went to work in this respect.

All the World knows that John Hus and Jerome of Prague were burnt alive at Constance. But every one has not been at the pains to examine, for what errors they suffered that rigorous punishment. They were then, and still are to this day, charged with maintaining impious, horrible, and damnable Tenets. They were condemned as seditious, obstinate, and incorrigible followers and defenders of Wickliff; hardened, crafty, malicious, and convicted Hereticks. Had there been yet stronger terms to express the abhorrence of these Heresies, they would have been used without scruple. But, wherein consisted these Heresies? In their being Disciples of Wickliff? If the authors who speak of their sentence be consulted, scarce one will be found that says more. John Hus and Jerome of Prague were followers of Wickliff, and consequently abominable wretches, deserving to be burnt. In the opinions of Wickliff then we are to search for their errors. Now herein is an ambiguity, which has been constantly used to justify the condemnation of these two Doctors. It is hardly to be questioned, that the Council of Constance had that same ambiguity in view, when the caused the errors and memory of Wickliff to be first stigmatized, before John Hus and Jerome of Prague were brought upon their Trial.

Wickliff's opinions were of two kinds. Some concerned the principal Doctrines of Faith. Others related to the Hierarchy, the Clergy, their Jurisdiction, Power, and Riches. Wickliff did not believe Transubstantiation. He rejected the invocation of Saints, the adoration of the Crofs and Images, Pilgrimages, and Relicks. On the other hand, he thought the Hierarchy had no foundation in Scripture. From whence he drew several conclusions against the excessive authority usurped by the Popes, the Cardinals, the Bishops. Moreover, he taxed the Clergy with leading very immoral and dissolute lives, and maintained that the revenues of the Church were greatly misapplied. From these principles his enemies inferred numberless consequences, some whereof had never perhaps entered into his thoughts. There were at last found in his writings two hundred and sixty capital errors. His followers added many more which he had never taught, and the whole was imputed to him, as if he had maintained them all in express terms.

However it be, John Hus embraced Wickliff's opinions, but it was only in what concerned the Hierarchy and Clergy. It is certain, he believed Transubstantiation, and died in that belief. As for Images, his opinion was that a man might honour them, kneel to them, light up Wax-tapers before them, kiss them, because the intention referred that worship to the originals. So, it is a thing out of doubt, that he was not burnt for maintaining errors in the principal Doctrines of Faith, but for opinions which combated the exorbitant power and riches of the Church, that is to say, of the Clergy. All possible endeavours were used to make him confess, he believed not Transubstantiation; but he could never be brought to such a confession. And yet, by the advice of the Cardinal of Florence, the Council condemned him upon the deposition of the Witnesses, who accused him of rejecting that Doctrine, without regarding his own express declaration to the contrary. It is not very difficult to conceive the Council's aim, in causing that Article to be inserted in Hus's sentence. The Council was sensible, it must have appeared very strange, that a Person should be burnt, whose Principles tended to a reformation, in the head and in the members of the Church, which all Christianism required, and which the Council it self feigned to believe necessary. It was requisite therefore to justify the sentence, by rendering this Man odious, as rejecting a fundamental Article of Faith. For this reason, without distinguishing Wickliff's errors, John Hus and Jerome of Prague were condemned as followers of that Arch-Heretick. It was thereby insinuated, that they embraced all the opinions of their master.

But to shew, by an unexceptionable testimony, that these two Men were burnt for their opinions concerning the Clergy, I need only quote what Aneas Sylvius, alias Pope Pius II, says in his History of Bohemia. The Deputies of the Council having admonished the accused to forsake their errors, and conform to the Church's sentiments, they answered, That they were indeed lovers of the Holy Gospel, and true Disciples of Christ; That the Church of Rome, and all the other Churches in the World were far swerved from the Apostolical Traditions: That the Clergy ran after pleasures and riches: That they lorded it over the People, affected the highest seats at entertainments, and bred Horses and Dogs: That the revenues of the Church, which belonged to the poor Members of Christ, were consumed in vanity and wantonness: That the Priests were ignorant of the Commandments of God, or if they did know them, lightly regarded them.

The Fathers of the Council, continues the Historian, perceiving and knowing the invincible obstinacy of these People, judged that the corrupted Members of the Church that were incurable, ought to be cut off, lest they should infect the rest of the Body. Accordingly sentence was passed upon them, all the Fathers unanimously agreeing, that Persons who rejected sound Doctrine, approved by the Church, deserved to be burnt.

This account most evidently shews, wherein consisted the Heresy of John Hus and Jerome of Prague; namely, in their accusing the Clergy of Corruption. It was therefore, to destroy these enemies of the Clergy, that the Council made no scruple to violate the Safe-conduct given by the Emperor Sigismund to John Hus, or at least to allow him to violate it himself. Moreover the Council had no regard to the promise they had publicly given to Jerome of Prague, in order to draw him to Constance. It is true, the Council had inserted these words in their engagement, Without prejudice to justice, and as far as the Catholick Faith requires it, a captious Clause, if ever there was one. For was not the Catholick Faith the very point in question; and of what use could the Council's promise be to Jerome of Prague, unless against justice? Did he run any hazard, or stand in need of such a promise, if he had not held the Tenets he was charged with?

Let us proceed now to the decree of this Council, against Communion in both kinds. We shall see in this, as well as in the foregoing Article, that the authority of the Church or the Clergy was the sole point in question. The Fathers of Constance condemned not Communion in both kinds as sinful in itself. On the contrary, they owned, it was practised in the primitive Church, and that the Church had power to grant it to the Laity, if the thought proper. But they anathematized such as maintained, the Church had not a right to abolish this practice. What did they mean then by the Church? Did they not mean the Councils composed of the several Members of the Clergy? It is so true, that, in this decree, the Council's sole view was to support the authority of the Church Representative, that, some years after, another General Council made no scruple to allow the Hussites the liberty of communicating in both kinds, without any apprehension that the Faith was therein concerned, when they were willing to receive that liberty as a favour from the Church.

As to other opinions which appeared at the same time, but which attacked not the Clergy, the Council of Constance behaved with an astonishing coldness. John Petit, advocate of the Duke of Burgundy, maintained, it was lawful for any private Person to kill a Tyrant, even by surprize. This Tenet being brought before the Council, how did they proceed? After much sollicitation, they declared it erroneous, without naming the Author, or coming upon his Person, though they had ordered Wickliff's Bones to be dug up thirty years after his burial. The Sect of the Scourgers (1) broached several capital errors. But the Council was content with the bare proposal of finding some gentle means to restore them to the unity of the Church.

What reformation could be expected from a Council, which so rigorously prosecuted such as contested the privileges of the Pope, the Cardinals and the Clergy? The reformation must have begun with the suppression of most of these Prerogatives. Indeed, before Martin V's election, the reforming of the Court of Rome was talked of in the Council; and a list of the abuses to be redressed, was drawn up. But by the artifices of some, and particularly of the Cardinals, this noble design came to nothing. A Pope was elected, and the Pope elect found means to have this Article deferred to a more convenient Season.

(1) Otherwise called Flagellantes. This Sect first appeared at Perusa in 1260, having for its Author a Hermit named Reinardus. They carried a Crofs in their hands, wore a Cow on their heads, and went naked to the waist. Twice a day, and once in the night, they lashed themselves with knotted Cords stuck with Points or Pins, which gave occasion to their name. They affirmed, That their Blood united in such a manner with Christ's, that it had the same virtue. They persuaded the People, that the Gospel had ceased, and suffered all sort of Persecutions.

This is the sum of the most remarkable Transactions in the Council of Constance. A very full account of these things will be found in the fore-mentioned new History, to which the Reader is referred. Let us see now what the Council of Basil acted with respect to the Hussites, and the quarrel of Pope Eugenius IV. with the same Council. Nothing is more proper to shew the State of the Church of those days.

History of the Council of Basil.

The Bohemians, who for the most part had embraced the opinions of John Hus, highly resented the usage he had met with. This severity serving only to confirm them in their Tenets, they resolved to maintain them in spite of the Council's decrees. Communion in both kinds was the principal Doctrine. This occasioned terrible commotions in Bohemia, which Martin V. greatly inflamed by his haughty treatment of the Hussites. In the midst of these troubles, Wenceslaus King of Bohemia dying, Sigismund his Brother, who was Emperor, pretended to the succession. But the Bohemians rejected him, because he would not consent, they should live in the Faith they professed. Martin V. supporting Sigismund, published a Crusade against the Hussites, and thereby obliged them to arm in defence of their lives. It is needless to inquire here, whether Sigismund had any right to mount the Throne of Bohemia without the consent of the States. This is a query which would lead me too far. However that be, Ziska a Bohemian, heading the Hussites, defeated Sigismund several times, and made him as well as the Pope despair of extirpating these pretended Heretics by arms. This War lasted till the Council of Basil, without Sigismund's being able to take peaceable possession of the Kingdom of Bohemia.

The Council of Basil, which met in 1431, finding that the Arms of Sigismund and the Croisades had not the success that was expected, resolved to make Peace with the Hussites. Probably, their aim was to set Sigismund at any rate on the Throne of Bohemia, in order to enable him the better to take proper measures to extirpate these People. For that purpose, they sent Deputies into Bohemia, to invite the Hussites to come and produce their reasons before the Council. They agreed to it, and their Deputies being arrived at Basil, required these four things, for which they offered to be reconciled to the Church.

First, That Communion in both kinds should be admitted to the Bohemian Laity.

Secondly, That offenders should be punished according to the Law of God, and by those whose proper business it was.

Thirdly, That the word of God should be preached by able Priests.

Fourthly, That the Clergy should have no Temporal Jurisdiction.

These were the sentiments of the Hussites, for which so bloody a War had been made upon them, even to the exciting all Europe against them. But it was not so much for their Doctrines that they were thus cruelly persecuted, but for their obstinate refusal to submit to the decisions of the Church, and for their contempt of the Clergy. The Council used all possible endeavours to persuade the Bohemian Deputies to an unconditional submission to the Church. But at last, perceiving they insisted upon the four Articles, the Council thought fit to grant them upon this condition, that they should be first explained, because being couched in general terms they might give occasion to fresh disputes. The Hussites consenting, the Council explained the four Articles as they judged convenient. After that, an agreement was drawn conformable to the four Articles and their explication.

This affair being thus settled, Sigismund demanded to be received for King of Bohemia, and was so accordingly, after signing certain conditions; namely, the approbation of the agreement, and some others relating thereto. It seemed that the persecution against the Hussites was thereby to cease. But Sigismund was no sooner on the Throne of Bohemia, but he disappointed them. On the other hand, the Pope pretending, they observed not the conditions on which the four Articles were granted, positively refused to approve of the agreement. This occasioned in Bohemia fresh troubles, which were always fomented by the Court of Rome, and which properly ended not till the middle of the last Century, in the utter ruin of the Hussites.

Before we leave this subject, let us make one reflection. Let the Hussites be inveighed against as much as you please: Let them be accused of holding impious and detestable errors, yet these same errors must be reduced to the four Articles exhibited by themselves to the Council of Basil. For this, Crusades were published against them, and John Hus, and Jerome of Prague were burnt. But a general Council, owned by all the world, when the agreement was granted them, judged, these Articles might be suffered without prejudice to the Catholic Faith. It follows therefore, that war was made upon them solely for the support of the Church's authority. That was the main point of Religion. But why were they persecuted afterwards? It was because the Popes would never stand to the agreement, though the Hussites frequently offered to submit to the Church upon that condition. It is therefore evident, that the War from the beginning to the end, was wholly founded upon this Principle, That the Church has a despotick power, and that it is unlawful to bind her to any conditions. But what Church is this, invested with so high a Prerogative? It cannot be a General Council, since such a Council has not judged that Article unquestionable. It is therefore the Pope alone which must be meant by the Church. It will be said, perhaps, that the authority of the Council of Basil is not acknowledged by a great part of the Church; but this will be groundless. For, the agreement with the Hussites was made before the Council was removed to Ferrara, and the Council of Basil is owned by all the world for lawful before that removal.

We are now going to see a quarrel of another nature, not of the Church with her heretical enemies, but of the Church with herself, of the Members with the Head. Till the Council of Basil, the Popes and the Councils were very well agreed to improve the Church's authority, and cause it to be absolutely obeyed. By the help of the equivocal word Church, an entire submission was required of Christians, sometimes to the Pope as the head, sometimes to the Councils as representatives of the Body, according as occasion offered to improve that Term, for the benefit of either. As for the Christian Laity, they had been long excluded out of the meaning of the word Church. However, though in confining the signification of the word Church to the Clergy alone, there still remained some ambiguity, it had not yet been removed, by deciding whether the authority of the Church was lodged in the body of the Clergy, or in the Pope as head. The Councils of Pisa and Constance had taken some steps towards assuming this Authority, in deposing the Popes themselves. But Martin V., after his Election, had artfully evaded the decision of this important Point, either by breaking up the Council, or by confirming whatever was done with regard to the Doctrines, without meddling with any of the other Articles. He knew, it would be very prejudicial for him, if the question was decided by the Council, as it would be for the Council the moment they broke up. At length, the Council of Basil had occasion to take this Question into consideration.

The Council had been called by Martin V. who had now appointed Cardinal Julian Cesarini to preside as Legate. Martin dying in 1431, before the Council was assembled, Eugenius IV. was chosen in his room. The new Pope opened not the opening of the Council, but intended it should not continue long. For some time, the necessity of reforming the Church both in the Head and Members, had been every where talked of. Now as such a Reformation must have been made by a General Council, such a Council could not but terrify a Pope, who had not yet had time to taste the sweets of the Pontificate. The Council of Basil was no sooner assembled, but Eugenius sought means to dissolve it. He found a pretence in the Council's Invitation of the Hussites to Basil, during the first Session. He affirmed, these Heretics having been condemned in the Council of Constance, ought not to be allowed a re-hearing. Upon this frivolous pretence he published a Bull for dissolving the Council.

Instead of submitting to the Pope's pleasure, the Council resolved to continue their Sessions. Hence sprung a quarrel, which produced a real Schism, some maintaining the authority of the Council, and others remaining attached to the Pope. The Council made several Decrees, which placed the authority of a General Council above that of the Pope, and the Pope annulled these Decrees, affirming, the body could act but by the directions of the head. The Emperor, the King of France, and most of the other Princes declaring immediately for the Council, Eugenius saw himself under a necessity to approve the Council, and consent that the Sessions should be continued. But having sent other Legates to preside in his name, the Council refused to receive them as Presidents. This was a fresh occasion of dissension. The Pope threatened to dissolve the Council, and the Council threatened to suspend the Pope. Accordingly, they made some advances to accomplish it. Whereupon Eugenius finding himself the weakest, was obliged once more to approve and confirm the Council.

The

The forced compliance of the Pope appealed the quarrel for some time. But in 1435, the Council having shewn, they would seriously endeavour a reformation of the Church in the Head and Members, and made, for that purpose, Decrees to abolish the Fifth-fruits, and settle the rights of the Apostolick Chamber, the Pope saw himself ruined, unless he found some way to stop their proceedings. On the other hand, the Cardinals easily perceived, that since the Pope was begun with, their turn would soon come. There were Bishops too, who were sorry to see a Reformation going forward, which would be to their prejudice in many things, tho' they might hope to be gainers by it in some respects. This occasioned the forming of two opposite parties in the Council; but however, the reformers had the majority. Mean while, the Pope continued to gain ground, since the Cardinals, and several Bishops thought it for their Interest to support him.

Another thing helped likewise to fet the Pope's affairs upon a good foot. Some time since, [John Emanuel Palæologus] Emperor of Constantinople, had been vigorously attacked by the Turks. As he wanted assistance, he imagined, if he could unite the Greek Church with the Latin, the Pope and Princes of Europe would assist him with all their Forces, in defence of his Empire. This affair had been already propoed to Martin V, and it was chiefly with design to accomplish this Union, that Pope Martin had called the Council of Basil, where the Greek Emperor was to come in person, with the Bishops of his Church. Eugenius IV failed not to improve this opportunity to strengthen his party. He sent Nuntios to this Emperor, to acquaint him, that the time was come to perform his promise; but, as it might be inconvenient for him and his Attendants to repair to Basil, he promised to remove the Council to some good Town in Italy, provided he would engage to be present. On the other hand, the Council sent likewise Ambassadors to Constantinople, to dissuade the Emperor from coming to any other place than Basil. But the Emperor had already resolved to repair wherever the Pope should appoint. The Fathers of Basil plainly perceiving, the Pope intended to remove the Council elsewhere, made haste and passed several Decrees, which very much lessened the Papal Authority, and at length cited the Pope before them.

Eugenius little regarded the proceedings against him at Basil. When he heard the Greeks were arrived at Venice, he published a Bull for translating the Council of Basil to Ferrara. The Council refused to comply with the Bull, and by a majority of Votes suspended the Pope till he should come in person and make his defence. Mean while, Cardinal Julian President of the Council, and the rest of the Cardinals, except one, left Basil, carrying with them a good number of Bishops, and repaired to Ferrara, where the Pope opened his Council the 10th of February 1438. Thus arose a new sort of Schism between the Councils, which both called themselves General, and mutually condemned each other. But the Pope's had soon a considerable advantage of the other, by the arrival of the Greek Emperor at Ferrara, with a great many Prelates of his Nation. The next year Eugenius translated the Council to Florence, where a sort of Union was made between the Greeks and Latins, which lasted not long (1).

Mean time, the Council of Basil still continuing their proceedings against Eugenius IV, came at last to depose him, and elect another Pope in his room, namely, Amedeus Duke of Savoy, who having resigned the Government of his Dominions, was retired to the solitudes of Ripaille. The new Pope assumed the name of Felix V. Hence was formed in the Church a double Schism, between two General Councils, and two Popes, who thundered their Anathemas against one another, to the great scandal of Christendom. It was no small embarrassment to meet people, to see two Popes and two Councils condemning one another, and each excommunicating the Adherents of the other party, without sparing even those who thought to escape by standing neutral.

Charles VII, who then reigned in France, caused a Synod to be held on this occasion, in which it was resolved, that France should own the Council of Basil for lawful, but should remain however in the obedience of Pope Eugenius. Another embarrassment to the French. Indeed, it is pretty hard to conceive, how two such opposite things could be reconciled.

In 1441 was held in Germany another such Assembly, where no better expedient was found, than the calling a new Council somewhere else than at Basil and Florence; and that Germany should remain neuter till this new Council was assembled. A Diet held at Frankfurt, in 1442, approved of this expedient, and the Council of Basil consented to it, though with reluctance. But obstacles occurred, that prevented the execution of this design.

Mean while, Felix V, not being pleased with the Council of Basil for taking so much upon them, resolved to withdraw to Laufanne, on pretence that Basil Air did not agree with him. On the other hand, Eugenius translated the Council of Florence to Rome, in the Church of St. John of Lateran, where they began their Sessions in 1444.

At length, in 1446, the Princes of Germany, assembled at Frankfurt, unanimously resolved, that if Eugenius would not redress the Grievances complained of, they would all recognize Pope Felix. Eugenius demurred at first. But the Emperor telling him, he must comply, or resolve to lose all Germany, he granted whatever the Germans desired, whereupon an Agreement was made.

This was a terrible blow to the Council of Basil, who had now lost Italy, Arragon, and several other States. As for France, they could not much rely upon her, since the still continued in obedience to Pope Eugenius. England had likewise so far declared for that Pope, as that we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, Henry VI sent an Embassy to make a league with him.

Eugenius IV died whilst these things were transacting, and had for Successor Nicholas V.

The Council of Basil losing great part of their Authority, and Felix V having but very few friends, the King of France held a Synod at Lyons, to seek means to put an end to the Schism. Felix V sending Legates thither, it was resolved, with his consent, that if Nicholas V would grant him certain conditions, he would resign the Pontificate. This was the subject of a Negotiation, which lasted the whole year 1448. Mean while, the Council of Basil, finding themselves forsaken by almost all the world, and despairing of farther protection at Basil, since the Emperor and Germany had declared for Eugenius, resolved to remove to Laufanne.

At last, Felix having obtained most of his desires, resigned the Papal Dignity in 1449. But it was with the consent of his Council, who found means to preserve still some remains of Authority. By their last Decree, they approved of Felix's resignation, created him Cardinal and Legate a latere (2) in Savoy and the Tarantaise, and allowed him to wear the papal Habit all his Life. Nicholas V confirmed this Decree according to Agreement. Thus ended at length the Schism, in which there was a complication of three Schisms: First, between Eugenius IV, and the Council of Basil; then between two General Councils; and lastly, between two Popes. The first may be said not to be yet ended, since the dispute which occasioned it, still subsists. The Court of Rome's Adherents perpetually inveigh against the Council of Basil, for decreeing, that a General Council is above the Pope. On the other hand, their opposers rest upon the Decrees of this Council to support their opinion. Very probably, this question will remain long undecided.

I have a little enlarged upon what passed in the two famous Councils of Constance and Basil, because nothing, in my opinion, is more proper to discover the wretched state of the Church of those days. From the close of the last Schism, to the end of the XVth Century, the papal Chair was filled with Popes cruelly bent upon the destruction of the Hussites, contrary to the Faith of the Agreement, or wholly employed in maintaining the exorbitant power usurped by their Predecessors, and generally to have an opportunity to satisfy their Avarice.

Calixtus III, Successor of Nicholas V, so oppressed the 1455. Germans, that they were forced at length to break the Concordat (3) made with Eugenius IV, plainly perceiving it was entirely useless. the Characters of the Popes from the 15th to the 17th Century.

Pius II, lately canonized, was so far from consenting to a reformation in the Head of the Church, that he excommunicated by a Bull, all persons that should dare to appeal from the Pope to a General Council. 1458.

Paul II was no sooner chosen, than he broke the Oath taken before his Election, concerning the redress of certain abuses, which himself, with the rest of the Cardinals, had deemed necessary. Never were the Gratie Expectative [or Bulls for Church-Preferments before they become void] more frequent, than whilst he sat in the 1464.

(1) The Emperor, in order to compass his ends, compelled the Greek Fathers to assent to the four Articles: 1. That there is a Purgatory. 2. That the Pope is Head of the Church. 3. That the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son. 4. That unallowed Bread may be used in the Eucharist. But when they came home, they declared against the Council, and renounced their Subscriptions.

Papal Chair. He spent the whole time of his Pontificate in striving to abolish the pragmatic Sanction (1) in France, which debarred him of the liberty of doing there whatever he pleased.

1471. Sixtus IV, ruled, by one of his Bulls, the Hierarchy to the highest degree it could be carried, at a time when the excessive power usurped by the Clergy was generally complained of.

1484. Innocent VIII, quarrelled with Ferdinand of Arragon, King of Naples, and by his Solicitations inclined Charles VIII, to carry his Arms into Italy.

1492. Alexander VI, was one of the most corrupt Men of his age. 'Tis of him a famous Roman Catholick writer gives this fine Character, that he would have been the wickedest Man in the world, if his Bastard Son (2) had not been more wicked than himself.

I pass over in silence the cruel eagerness of all these Popes, to persecute the Bohemians, contrary to the Faith of their Concordat. The Crusades against the Turks, in which they would have engaged all the Princes of Europe, appeared very specious; but Sovereigns were so well fastidied, that in publishing Crusades, the Popes had only their own private Interest in view, that they could never confide in them.

Such in general was the state of the Christian Church in the xvth Century, upon which I shall make but one single remark, leaving my Readers at liberty to add as many as they please. What I would observe is, that the abstract I have given, evidently shows, how trifling their opinion is, who say, it is not the business of private persons to endeavour a reformation of the Church, but it must be left to the care of the Church herself. What then is this Church, from which we are to expect this happy Reformation? Doubtless, this is not what is meant by the word Church. It is the Pope with his Cardinals? But these are the very Men who have all along hindered it, and very probably, will, to the utmost of their power hinder it for ever. Shall a General Council undertake this Reformation? But what has hitherto passed in these Assemblies, affords no room to expect so great a benefit. Besides, who shall call this General Council? of whom shall it be composed? who shall preside? Can the Pope be persuaded to convene a General Council to reform the Church? will he give the Precedency to another, that himself and Court may be with more freedom reformed? In a word, will it not be the Pope, the Cardinals, the Prelates, that will have the deliberative vote in this Council? but these are so many persons concerned to leave things as they are.

Will it be said with some, that the Church has no need of reformation? that she is innocent and pure, without spot or wrinkle, or any thing like it? that all the Privileges enjoyed by the Popes, the Cardinals, the Bishops, belong to them by divine Right? that the Pope exercises only the power committed to him by Christ? that his decisions are infallible, as well in point of fact, as of right; and the same obedience must be paid to his Decrees, as to those of God himself? but if, pursuant to this principle, the Popes should unhappily enlarge their Phylacteries, and every day form new pretensions, as it has but too frequently happened, how shall they be stopped, if 'tis confessed, the Church has no need of reformation, or must be left to reform herself?

State of the Church of England. After viewing the state of the Church in general, it is time to proceed to that of the Church of England in particular. England, with regard to Religion, was in the same condition with the rest of Europe. The people passionately wished for a reformation of sundry abuses crept into the Church. The Clergy strenuously opposed it, as every change would be to their prejudice. As for the Kings, they made Religion subservient to their Interest. When they imagined they wanted the Clergy, they found ways enough to evade the people's desires. But when the Parliament's favour was requisite, they assented to the Statutes, by which the Incroachments of the Pope and Clergy were restrained.

In the beginning of the Century, Henry IV, whose chief aim was to fix himself in the Throne, and who thought he could not effect it without the Clergy, seemed throughout his whole Reign to have a great deference for them. Hence proceeded all the Statutes passed in those days against the Lollards. Henry V, showed at first great inclination to strip the Clergy of their riches, according to the Parliament's desire; but afterwards, turning his thoughts to the Conquest of France, carefully avoided that Religion should cause any troubles in his Kingdom. It was highly necessary, in order to execute his grand projects, that his Subjects should be ready to assist him with their purses. But on the other hand, he was no less concerned to live in a good understanding with the Court of Rome, lest she should hinder his enterprise. He knew what she was capable of, when she thought herself injured. So, artfully managing both the Pope and his Subjects, he prevented the first from abusing his power too much, without depriving him, however, of what he possessed. By this prudent conduct, he made his Reign peaceable, with respect to Religion. We must except, however, what he did in the beginning against the Lollards. He had suffered himself to be prepossessed, that they had conspired against his life; and that belief made him at first a little severe. But as he was endued with an excellent judgement, he soon discerned the interests of the Clergy from those of Religion, and put a stop to the persecutions of the unhappy Lollards. Henry VI, was a weak Man, ever ready to receive the impressions that were given him. Had he held the reigns of the Government himself, very probably the Clergy would have gained much ground in his Reign. But the directors of his affairs, as well during his minority, as after, were Men of a very different character. Besides, the French War, the disturbances at Court after the King's marriage, and the Civil Wars which quickly followed, gave those at the Helm no time to think much of Religious affairs. For the same reason, the Reign of Edward IV, was not disturbed either by the Lollards, or their adversaries. It is true, Edward showed a great consideration for the Clergy, in granting them a favour constantly denied by the former Kings. But his complaisance did not go so far as to indulge persecution. The Reigns of Edward V, and Richard III, were wholly spent in domestic troubles, which had no influence upon the affairs of the Church. As for Henry VII, he made it a rule, to keep the Church upon the same foot he found it when he mounted the Throne. He ever avoided, as a Rock, all innovations which might obstruct the execution of his two sole designs; namely, to secure the Crown to himself and his Heirs, and to heap up Money. Such was, with regard to Religion, the disposition of the Kings that reigned in England during the Fifteenth Century.

As for the English Nation, it is certain, it was generally Wickliffite in some respects. Wickliff's opinions manifestly tended to these two principal ends: First, to reform the Government of the Church, and to set bounds to the power of the Pope and Clergy. Secondly, to alter the Church's Creed concerning some Doctrines long since received, and which he thought contrary to Scripture. Now as he found it almost impossible, that Christians should return to what he believed the ancient Faith of the Church, because the Clergy were concerned to maintain the established errors, he strongly insisted upon the first point, as being absolutely necessary to the attainment of the second. It is certain, that with respect to his general aim, in the first of these two Articles, not only his professed Followers, but all the rest of the People did, as it were, join with him. For many Ages the English had felt the oppression wherein the Pope and Clergy had kept them. In all Christendom no Nation had more experienced the rigour of this Dominion. The History of England shows it so manifestly, that a Man would be blind not to see it. But though the History were suspected, the Statutes of Provisors and Praemunire, so frequently revived, leave no room to question, that the English thought themselves oppressed. So, it may be said, that in general the English Nation was Wickliffite as to the first point, though many believed, Wickliff would have carried the reformation a little too far, and to correct the abuses of the Hierarchy, had run into the contrary extreme. But the nation was not generally Wickliffite, with respect to the second Article; namely, the alteration of belief concerning the Doctrines. Indeed, Wickliff had in this respect many Followers, but they were not the Majority. Thus the name of Wickliffite, or Lollard, was an equivocal term, capable of being understood in two different senses. Sometimes it signified a Man, who separating from the Church, embraced all Wickliff's opinions. It might likewise be understood of one, who remaining in the Church, as it was then, and adhering to the received Doctrines, was, however, of Wickliff's opinion concerning the temporal and spiritual Jurisdiction of the Clergy. In this last sense there were more Lollards in England than can be imagined. This distinction may serve to account for divers proceedings of the Parliaments in the beginning of the XVth Century, which seem to be contrary one to another. Sometimes they were seen to speak and act like Lollards, earnestly demanding, that the Clergy should be stript of their riches, and sometimes to condemn these same Lollards to the flames, when they considered them in the first sense before-mentioned. The Clergy knew how to take advantage of the ambiguity of that term. When a Man was so hardy as to show that it were to be wished, some alteration were made in the Government of the Church, he was infallibly accused of being a Lollard, and charged with all Wickliff's opinions. Hence he became odious, because the true Lollards maintained Doctrines repugnant to the Faith of those days. The first Parliament which petitioned Henry IV., to seize the Church-Lands, could not escape that imputation, which made a deep impression in the King's mind. Thus it often happened, that People did not dare openly to approve Wickliff's first opinions, for fear of being taxed also with holding the others, and exposed to suffer for Tenets they received not, as it happened to John Hus; and Jerome of Prague. It was not without cause that the Clergy prosecuted the Lollards with such animosity, since their Principles tended to no less than to deprive them of all their Prerogatives. At this very day, the Church of England, though embracing Wickliff's opinions, concerning the Doctrines, cannot forbear expressing very little esteem for that Doctor, because he has combated the Hierarchy, which the has thought proper to retain.

(1) This is an Edict passed in the Council of Bourges in the Reign of Charles VII. It was levelled against Papal Provisions, the payment of First-Fruits, and other incroachments of the Court of Rome. In a word, it contrasted the Privileges of the Catholic Church, and was taken out of the Acts of the Council of Constance and Basel.

The Lollards were persecuted, sometimes more, sometimes less, according to the character of the Kings, the Archbishops, and the rest of the Prelates, but chiefly according to the circumstances of affairs. In general, the beginning of the XVth Century was much more severe for them, than the middle or the end. The reason is evident. For as their number continually increased, their enemies found much less support, and themselves more protection. In the beginning of the XVth Century, which was the most troublesome time for them, there were, however, but very few burnt; of which three principal reasons may be given: First, as the Statutes did not enact that all in general should be burnt, who held the Tenets of Wickliff, but only such as preached or taught them publicly, the number of the guilty was not very great. These Statutes were not observed after the manner of the Inquisition, but agreeably to the liberties and privileges of the English Nation. In the next place, the Idea which the Clergy were pleased to give of the Lollards, was, that they entirely subverted Religion. But often, in the examination of the parties accused as such, it appeared that they only believed, the Pope and Clergy abused their power too much, which was the general opinion of the Kingdom. It was well known, the Parliament had not that in view, in their Statute against the Lollards. Lastly, the Judges themselves sometimes happened to be of the Sect, and this was the occasion of the Statute in the Reign of Henry V., obliging all Magistrates, at their entrance into Office, to swear to the execution of the Laws against the Lollards. But I do not know whether that Statute was ever punctually observed. If we believe Walsingham the Monk, the Judges and several Bishops themselves were very remiss in the prosecution of the Lollards. This he ascribes to the general corruption which reigned in England. But this corruption was nothing else but the inclination of the English for Wickliff's opinions; or, at least, their scruple to put People to death on account of Religion. The most remarkable thing in England, concerning the Lollards, is the trial and punishment of Sir John Oldcastle, otherwise called Lord Cobham, of whom I have spoken in the Reign of Henry V. We must now proceed to another Subject; namely, the contests which England had with the Court of Rome during the XVth Century.

Notwithstanding all the complaints frequently carried to the Court of Rome, concerning her continual incroachments, and the precautions taken by several Parliaments to screen themselves from the same, the Popes did not abate their pretensions. The Acts of Parliament were to them but like Thunders without execution, which reached not their Rights. Upon every occasion, they made no scruple to act contrary to these Statutes, as if they had not been made; and assert their Apostolick power, without troubling themselves whether they prejudiced the King or his Subjects. The Parliament, willing to remedy the abuses flowing from the continual dispensations granted by the Pope without hearing the cause, passed in 1400 an Act, That all Persons who purchased or executed any Bulls to be discharged from the payment of Tythes, should incur the penalties contained in the Statute of Provisors. It was enacted by another Statute passed at the same time, That if any Person should procure a Provision to be exempt of the Jurisdiction of the Bishops, he should incur the same Penalties. These Acts being made chiefly with a view to the Monks, were not capable of producing the intended effect, because the Pope, by the fulness of his Apostolick authority, exempted the Monks from the observance of these Parliamentary Statutes. The Bishops, whom this affair chiefly concerned, not daring to dispute the power assumed by the Pope, it was the Parliament's business to defend their cause, as well as their own. To that purpose, the Statutes upon this Subject were revived, with an additional Clause, prohibiting the Monks in particular, to purchase or execute any such exemptions, upon the penalty comprised in the Statute of Premunire.

This Statute, which I have mentioned upon several occasions, was a terrible fence against the Court of Rome's Usurpations. Indeed, it did not directly attack the Pope, since the Parliament had no Jurisdiction over him. But as it hindered the English from applying to the Court of Rome for things contrary to the Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Laws of the Realm, it abridged the Pope of good part of the advantages which he pretended to reap from his Apostolick power. It will perhaps be thought strange that the Popes should be silent, when, and long after, this Statute was passed. But it is easy to discover the reason. The Schism which began in 1378, and lasted till 1409, hindered them from stirring. The Popes received by England, took care to give no offence at such a juncture. It is true, there was an interval of some years, during which Alexander V., and John XXIII., might have made some attempt against that Law. But Alexander's Pontificate was very short, and John was employed in affairs, as he thought, of more importance. Martin V. considered not this affair with the same indifference. In 1426, he writ a thundering Letter to Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury, upbraiding him for his remissness, and enjoining him to exert his utmost that this Statute might be repealed. Henry VI., who then reigned, not being above five years old, the Pope thought it a favorable juncture to compass his ends. It will not be perhaps unacceptable, to insert part of this Letter, which shows the Pope's sentiments concerning the pretended privileges of his See.

MARTIN,

SERVANT of the SERVANTS of GOD,

To his Reverend Brother, the Archbishop of CANTERBURY, Greeting, and Apostolical Benediction.

"HAD you considered what a strict account you must give to Almighty God for the Flock committed to your care: Had you called to mind the obligations of your Office, and how much you are bound to maintain the rights and honour of the Roman Church, of whom you hold your Dignity: Had you, I say, duly recollected these things, you would never have suffered your self to be seized with such a lethargy and negligence. No, you would have done your duty long since; you would have endeavoured to set right the misled, and opposed with all your power those who had sacrilegiously invaded the privileges granted by our Saviour to the Church. Was the authority of your Character bestowed upon you only to enrich your self, and give you opportunity of seeking your own, and not the things which are Jesus Christ's? If this be your opinion, you greatly mistake the instructions of our blessed Saviour, who, when he committed his Sheep to St. Peter's care, only commanded him to feed them; neither received he this command, till he had given his Master repeated assurances of his love. Is this then your manner of shewing your love to Christ? Is this feeding and taking care of the Flock? Will such conduct as this discharge your duty to the Holy See? Alas! your Flock are running down a precipice before your eyes, and you are regardless of their danger, and make no attempt to save them: You suffer them to feed in dangerous pastures without warning them; and, which is horrible, you seem to put poison in their mouths with your own hands: You see the Wolves scatter and tear them in pieces, and like a dumb Dog, vouchsafe not so much as to bark. You can behold the authority of our Blessed Saviour and the Holy See defiled and trampled on, without dropping one word of Remonstrance. One would have thought, you might at least, have whistled your dislike, though you had been so very prudent as not to have declared it publicly. Are you not sensible, you must one day account to the utmost Farthing for all omissions and prevarications of this kind? Do not you think, if any of your Flock are lost by your neglect, (and, alas! there are a great many,) their blood

Dispute between England and the Pope.

"blood will be required at your hands? Consider and tremble what vengeance God denounces by his Prophet Ezekiel: Son of man, I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel; if thou seest the sword come, and dost not blow the trumpet, and any person is taken away, his blood will I require at thy hands."

To see this beginning, would not one think the point in question was some new Heresy, tending to subvert the foundations of Religion? At least, one should believe, the Pope had the Wickliffites in view. But it was not so: We shall see in the sequel of the Letter what the affair was; namely, the Statute of Præmunire, which the Archbishop had not dared to be repealed, the Pope groundlessly supposing, it was in that Prelate's Power to annul the Laws of the Realm. He continued in this manner:

"I leave it to your self to consider, what abominable violence has been committed upon your Province. Pray read that Royal Law, if there's any thing in it that is either Law or Royal. For how can that be called a Statute, which repeals the Laws of God and the Church? Or how can it deserve the name of Royal, when it destroys the ancient customs of the Realm; and it is so contrary to these words of Scripture, The King loveth judgment? Tell me then, Reverend Brother, whether you, who are a Catholic Bishop, can think it reasonable such an Act as this should be in force in a Christian Country?"

"In the first place, under colour of this execrable Statute, the King of England grasps at the Spiritual Jurisdiction, and governs so absolutely in Ecclesiastical matters, as if our Saviour had appointed him his Vicar. He makes Laws for the Church and Clergy. In short, he makes so many Provisions about Clerks, Benefices, and the concerns of the Hierarchy, that one would think the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven were put into his hands, and the Superintendency of these affairs had been intrusted with him, and not with St. Peter."

"Besides these hideous Usurpations, he has enacted several penalties against the Clergy. Such a rigor is the more unjustifiable, as the English Government does not treat Turks and Jews with so great severity. People of all Countries and Persuasions have the liberty of coming into England. Only those who have Cures bestowed upon them by Christ's Vicar are excluded: Only those, I say, are banished, seized, imprisoned, stripped of their fortunes. If any ecclesiastical Person, charged with the execution of the Mandates and Censures of the Holy See, happens to set foot on English ground, and proceed in the business of his Commission, he is treated like an enemy, thrown out of the King's protection, and exposed moreover to still greater hardships. Was ever such Iniquity as this passed into a Law? Pray consider whether such Statutes as these are for the honour of the Kingdom; and whether it becomes you to be silent under all this outrage. Is this an instance of filial Obedience? Is this the English People's way of showing their regards to their Mother Church and the Holy See? Can that be called a Catholic Kingdom, where such profane Laws are practised; where application to Christ's Vicar is prohibited; where St. Peter's Successor is not allowed to execute our Saviour's Commission? Christ said to St. Peter, and in him to his Successors, feed my Sheep. But this Statute will not suffer him to feed them, but transfers that office upon the King, and pretends in several cases to give him Apostolical Authority. Christ built his Church upon St. Peter; but this Act of Parliament hinders the effect of this disposition, not permitting St. Peter's See to proceed in the functions of Government, or to make Provisions suitable to the necessities of the Church. Our Lord has ordered, that whatever his High-Priest shall bind or loose in Earth, shall be bound or loosed in Heaven: But this Statute over-rides the divine command: For if the immediate representative of our Saviour thinks fit to delegate any Priest to execute the Power of the Keys, contrary to the intent of the Statute, he is refused admittance, forced out of the Kingdom, stripped of his Effects, and made liable to farther Penalties. If any Discipline, if any Apostolick Censure, appear against this usage, it is punished as a capital offence."

"And what does your prudence think of all this? Is this a Catholic Statute? Can it be suffered without dishonour to our Saviour, without a breach upon the Laws of the Gospel, and the ruin of people's Souls? Why therefore did you not cry aloud? Why did you not lift up your voice like a Trumpet? Show your people their Transgression, and the House of Jacob their Sins, that their blood may not be required at your hands? If all persons who have the cure of Souls, are bound "to this duty, how much more are you, who have both the Priests and People committed to your care by the Holy See, by whose favour you enjoy the privilege of Primate and Legate for the Church of England, and have the honour of being Successor to that glorious Martyr St. Thomas, who, to remove the oppression of such Statutes, scrupled not to sacrifice himself for the Interest of the Church."

"These things considered, you, who ought to have set up the Church's Standard, been most forward in the defence of Religion, and animated your fellow Bishops to a noble Contest, are the first that turn your back, and decline the service. Thus, either by your great cowardice, or, as it is generally believed, by your downright prevarication, you discourage those who offer to make a stand. If therefore the Church complain of your conduct; if the whole be laid to your charge, be not surprized, but troubled at the Imputation. Let this reproach serve to put you upon reforming your conduct, and make you boldly perform the duties of your Office; which, were you but inclined to make the most of your power, would not be very difficult. Exert therefore your Character among the Laity; inform their understandings in this point, and endeavour to reclaim them. Show them what a snare this Statute will prove, and how much guilt it will draw upon their Consciences. Let your Admonitions be pressing and sharp, and then the crooked will be made straight, and the rough ways smooth."

After so severe a reprimand, the Pope continues to tell the Archbishop, that he thought himself bound in Conscience to deal thus plainly with him. Then he charges him, upon pain of Excommunication, to go immediately to the Privy-Council, and make what Interest he could, for repealing the Statute of Præmunire, to apply to both Houses of Parliament for the same purpose, and let them know, that all those who obey that Statute were under Excommunication. Moreover, he orders him to enjoin all the Clergy to preach publicly, and every where, the same Doctrine; to take with him two grave persons to attest his diligence, and to certify him of the result of the affair."

If it be inquired what made Martin V. so very angry with Chicheley, who was not concerned in the Statute of Præmunire, passed long before he was Archbishop, and who had not the power to procure a repeal, the reason is this. Chicheley had opposed to his utmost, the Papal Exemptions. He had dissuaded Henry V. from consenting, that Henry Beaufort his Uncle should be made Cardinal, Legate a latere for Life, and hold the Bishoprick of Winchester in Commendam. Moreover, he had said publicly, that all the Pope's proceedings tended only to drain England continually."

The Archbishop willing to justify himself, did not do it to the Pope's Satisfaction. On the contrary, he drew upon himself a still more thundering Letter, and after that a third, directed to the two Archbishops, wherein, to mortify Canterbury, York is named first. Chicheley fearing the Pope's threats, got some Bishops to write in his behalf, but nothing was capable of pacifying him. At length, he sent him a Letter himself, telling him, he heard by common report, that his Holiness had proceeded to a Sentence against him, which had never happened to any Archbishop of Canterbury since the days of St. Augustin. That however, he was not certain of the thing, because he was commanded by the King to bring all the Instruments, received from Rome, with the Seals whole, and lodge them in the Paper-Office till the Parliament fate."

Mean while, Martin V. resolving to push this affair, writ to the King and Parliament in a more haughty strain than had ever been used by any Pope. He admonishes, or rather commands them to repeal the Statute of Præmunire, otherwise he assures them they cannot be saved."

At last, the Archbishop, seeing the Pope thus obstinate, and not daring any longer to disobey him, went with several other Bishops to the House of Commons, where he made a long Speech, tending to persuade the House to repeal the Statute, and put them in mind of the danger of an Interdict upon the whole Kingdom. But neither his arguments nor threats, were capable of inducing the Commons to repeal, or even explain the Act. On the contrary, they addressed the King to take the Archbishop into his protection, and to write to the Pope in his behalf."

Pope Martin's Letter, and his extraordinary endeavours for repealing the Statute of Præmunire, afford matter for three remarks. The first is, this Letter is a demonstration, that the main of Religion was then made to consist in the Pope's Prerogatives, and the Clergy's Immunities. Hence it also appears, how averse Martin was to consent to the least diminution of his pretended Rights, and consequently to a reformation in the Head and Members of the Church, demanded with so much earnestness at the Council of Constance, where he was present himself.

The second remark is, that at all times the Popes, in their Contentions with the several States of Christendom, have always had great advantages. These advantages consisted, in that, by the threats of Excommunication and Interdict, they pushed matters so far, that there was need of great resolution not to be over-awed, and lose ground, either by agreement, or otherwise. But if this resolution was proof against all attempts, and the circumstances of affairs were not favorable to the Court of Rome, she had the power to stop when she pleased, in expectation of a better opportunity. They who had the misfortune to contend with her, always reckoned it a great Victory not to be vanquished, being satisfied if she would but suffer them to live in peace.

Conjecture
upon this Matter.

The third remark, is a Conjecture which I shall leave to the Reader's Judgment. Though Henry VI. was then but five years old, and his minority seemed to countenance the Pope's design, it is certain however, England had never been in a more prosperous condition. The English were quiet, and pleased with the Government, and the Victories of Crevant and Ferneuil had put their affairs in France upon a very good foot. On the other hand, the affairs of Charles VII. were in such disorder, that there was no appearance of their being ever restored; and therefore Martin V. could not deem it a proper time for him. Besides, the King's two Uncles were not disposed to suffer the Prerogatives Royal, and the People's Rights, to be trampled upon, when their affairs were in so flourishing a condition. It is therefore something probable, that Martin V. who was much more inclined to France than to England, made then all that stir, only to excite troubles in England, which would be of service to King Charles, and give him time to breathe. If the Archbishop had punctually obeyed him, and the Clergy every where preached against the Statute of Præmunire, pursuant to the Pope's express orders, the Parliament would have been forced to support their Act, and punish the Clergy's presumption. Then the Pope would have had a pretence to put the Kingdom under an Interdict, which would have greatly embroiled the affairs of the English in France. But Chicheley's prudence prevented the mischief which might have sprung from Martin's haughty proceedings. In short, Martin perceiving, he was supported neither by the King's Council, nor the Clergy, nor the People, dropped the affair, not thinking proper to expose his authority any farther. This conjecture is built upon Martin's continual partiality to France, whether out of Inclination, or because, indeed, it was not for the Interest of the Court of Rome, that France should be subject to England.

Before I leave the Præmunire, it will not be improper to observe, that this Statute had two principal Clauses. The first, containing the Statute of Provisors, made in the reign of Edward I. prohibiting to sollicite and procure Benefices from the Court of Rome by way of Provision, contrary to the rights of the Crown or the Patrons. The second forbid to carry to the Court of Rome, or elsewhere, Causes belonging to the King's Courts. The Clergy complained that by these words, or elsewhere, the King's Judges pretended to deprive the Ecclesiastical Courts of numberless Causes, which before they had the Cognizance of. They maintained, that these words, or elsewhere, inserted in the Act, had no relation to the Ecclesiastical Courts, but only to the several places where the Pope might reside. That nevertheless the Judges understood them in the first sense, and if there was in a process the least point belonging to the royal Jurisdiction, took occasion, from these two words, to remove it from the Ecclesiastical Court, as well as from the Court of Rome. In 1439, the Convocation complained to the King of the explanation of these terms by the Lay Judges, pretending it was contrary to the intent of the Law, for several reasons alleged in their address. For that time, the Clergy had no answer, or, if they had, it was not to their mind. But in the Reign of Edward IV. they obtained the King's Charter, prohibiting his Judges to meddle with criminal matters where the Clergy were concerned. I do not know whether Edward granted this Charter out of policy, to gain the Clergy's protection, or was convinced that the words, or elsewhere, were explained contrary to the Parliament's intention.

Other Controversies between the Parliament and Popes.

Besides the contentions occasioned by the Statute of Præmunire between England and the Court of Rome, there were also others which I shall but just mention. In 1403, in the Reign of Henry IV. the Parliament passed an Act, forbidding all Persons that should have Provision of any Benefice, to pay into the Apostolick Chamber more than was paid in old time. The penalty for offenders was, that they should forfeit to the King the same sum they paid the Pope. The occasion of this Statute was a Gracian introduced some time before by the Court of Rome. Which was, that no Person should have Provision of any Benefice that was void, till he had compounded with the Apostolick Chamber, as well for the First-Fruits, as for other lesser services in that Court, and paid, beforehand, the sum agreed upon.

But the greatest dispute between England and the Popes, was concerning the collation of the Bishoppicks. Though the Popes, when the first Anglo-Saxons were converted, had sent Italian or other foreign Bishops into England, it is certain that towards the latter-end of the Saxon Monarchy, the Bishops were chosen by the Chapters. The same privilege was continued to them after the Norman Conquest, and confirmed by King John's Charter. Mean while, the Popes having gradually extended their authority, assumed the power of bestowing Archbishops and Bishoppicks, by way of Provision, sometimes on one, sometimes on another pretence. This is what I have had frequent occasion to remark. They would have at once established this rule, that the disposal of all the Bishoppicks belonged to them by Divine Right; but meeting with obstacles, bethought themselves of another expedient; and that was, to get possession by degrees, in order afterwards to plead prescription. Thus being content at first with maintaining, that on certain occasions they had a power to fill the vacant Sees, they afterwards framed these occasions whenever they pleased. In short, they multiplied them so very fast, that hardly was there a vacant Bishoppick but what they filled by way of Provision. Time and favorable junctures confirming them in this Prerogative, there was no possibility to wrest it from them. Thus the Privilege of the Chapters was entirely destroyed.

Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, dying in 1413, the Monks of St. Augustin chose Henry Chicheley, Bishop of St. David's. But Pope John XXIII. annulled the election, declaring, that, for this turn, he had resolved to dispose of the Archbiscoprick by way of Provision. However, to avoid disputes, he made choice of the same Chicheley; preserving thereby his pretended right, without detriment to the Person elected.

But Martin V. dealt not so gently with England. He was no sooner seated in the Papal Chair, than he boldly disposed of all the vacant Sees, without any regard to the privilege of the Chapters. In two years only he filled, by way of Provision, thirteen Bishoppicks in the Province of Canterbury. It was not only with respect to the Sees that England had cause to complain of the Pope; he disposed likewise of all the other Benefices of the Kingdom, without troubling himself about the right of the Patrons, or the instruction of the People. The best preferments were generally conferred upon Foreigners, who understood not a word of English, or resided not in England, and sometimes even upon Children. For instance, he made Prosper Colonna, his Nephew, who was but fourteen years old, Archdeacon of Canterbury. Henry V. a high-spirited Prince, sent Ambassadors to Rome to complain both of these, and other grievances. But Martin V. delayed his answer so long, that the Ambassadors told him, the King their master, purely out of respect to the Holy See, had proceeded by way of request, to which he was not obliged; but for the future, he would use his Prerogative: That accordingly they had instructions to make a solemn protestation before himself and the Conclave, if his Holiness would not give them immediate satisfaction. I know not what answer the Pope returned; but not long after, Martin having translated the Bishop of Lincoln to the See of York, by way of Provision, the Chapter refused to admit him, and the Pope was forced to revoke his Bull.

In 1438, the University of Oxford complained, that Church-Preferments were bestowed without any regard to learning or merit: That the Colleges were thereby become empty, because there was no need of study or learning, to be qualified for a Benefice. Whereupon the Convocation, to whom this complaint was addressed, passed a Canon. That none but Graduates in the Universities should be capable of Benefices. But this was a weak fence against the Papal power.

Mean while, though the Court of Rome made the Apostolick authorities found very high, the Popes now and then met with mortifications. For example, in the Reign of Henry IV. the Parliament ordered, that the Peter-Pence should be deposited in the King's hands till the Schism was closed.

In the Reign of Henry V. the Alien Priors were suppressed without asking the Pope's consent.

Under Henry VI. Pope Nicholas V. demanding an extraordinary Subsidy of the Clergy of England, for the occasions of the Holy See, the King forbid the Clergy to grant it.

See Specimen
C. 11. T. 11.
P. 675-677.

The like demand, made some years after by Vicentini, a Nuntio, was sharply denied by the Clergy. The Papal power, formerly so dreadful to the whole Church, and particularly to England, began to be less feared. The Schisms did the Pope irreparable damage.

During the whole XVth Century, it does not appear that any National Councils were held in England, but only Convocations of the Clergy, in the two Ecclesiastical Provinces of Canterbury and York. The condemnation of the Lollards was almost the sole business of these Convocations. As for National Synods, they were become useless, since the Popes had engrossed the Cognizance of all Ecclesiastical Affairs. Besides, the least appeal to the Pope was sufficient to annul all the Canons of a Council. On the other hand, the Popes had so managed, that no National Synods could be held without their Licence. Now, as in these Synods there was but too frequent occasion to inquire into the extent of the Papal authority, they were grown so odious to the Court of Rome, that the use of them was infensibly laid aside. At this very day, in the States which have not yet received the Reformation, National Councils are no more talked of, or, at least, so very rarely, that it is plain the Popes allow them with reluctance and very great difficulties. Of this we have in France a late remarkable instance, in the transactions concerning the famous Constitution Unigenitus of Clement XI. King Lewis XIV, though powerful and formidable, could never obtain the Pope's leave to call a National Council, except on such terms as rendered the thing impracticable, though that Monarch's sole Aim was to cause the Constitution to be approved.

The Article of the eminent Men, who flourished in the Church of England during this Century, will not long detain us. Indeed, there were Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and other Clergymen, very famous, but it was neither for their piety nor learning. Their posts at Court, their Embassies, intrigues of the Cabinet, and share in the Revolutions in the Court and Kingdom, were the only things by which they were distinguished. Henry Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury was one of the best. For which reason he obtained not the honour of the Cardinalate, lavishly bestowed upon Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, upon Kemp, Bourchier, Morton, who were less worthy of it than he, if true merit had been regarded. But Chicheley wanted one indispensable quality of a Cardinal; namely, to be entirely devoted to the Holy See (1).

If there were any learned Men besides, they were so with respect to the time they lived in; when true learning was not much in vogue. And therefore it would be very needless to speak of each in particular, since their fame hardly out-lived them. Some were noted for their great animosity against the Lollards, and amongst the rest, Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury. This Prelate, in his Funeral Sermon for Ann of Luxemburg, Richard the second's Queen, highly commends her for spending her time in reading the Holy Scriptures in the vulgar tongue: And yet, some years after, in the Reign of Henry IV, he condemned in Convocation the translations of the Bible, as very pernicious (2).

(1) In 1439, he ordained, That Vicarages should not be endowed with a less Sum than twelve Marks a year. Spelman Conc. Tom. II. p. 689.

(2) As there was a scarcity of Persons eminent in other parts of Learning in this rude and illiterate Century, so was there likewise of Historians. The most noted were:

Sir JOHN FROISSART, who wrote a General History of the Affairs of France, Spain, &c. but chiefly of England. He was a Frenchman born, but was brought up in his Youth in the Court of Edward III, and familiarly conversant in that of Richard II. He wrote in his own Tongue, which was then the Court Language of England. In the English Edition, published by Sir John Bourchier, at the command of Henry VIII, the mistakes that had crept into the French Copies are corrected. His account of matters seems to be plain and honest; and perhaps none gives a better of the affairs of Edward III and Richard II. Scipio has made good use of him.

ENGUERRAND DE MONSTRELET, and PHILIP DE COMMINES, may not improperly be called Froissart's Continuators. They give a faithful and complete account of the Affairs of England, as far as they are intermixed with, or have any relation to those of France, Burgundy, &c.

THOMAS WALTINGHAM, a Benedictine Monk of St. Albans. His Historia Brevis (or Short History) begins at the Conclusion of Henry III's Reign, where Matthew Paris ended his. The account he gives is well enough; and we are indebted to him for many things not taken notice of by any other Writer of those times. His Tridigma Normannie (as he calls it) gives an account of Normandy, from the time it came first into the hands of Rollo and his Descendants, down to the sixth year of Henry V, wherein the Readers will find many occurrences not elsewhere to be met with. Both these Works were published by Archbishop Parker, in 1574, and reprinted at Frankfort in 1693.

JOHN HARDING comes next, a northern Englishman, and an inveterate Enemy to the Scots. He collected whatever might tend to the Proof of the ancient Vassalage of Scotland to the Crown of England; and hearing of an old Record in that Kingdom which put the Matter past dispute, he went in disguise, with much ado brought it away, and shewed it to Henry V, Henry VI, and Edward IV. To the last of these he dedicated his two Books of Chronicles in English Rhime. Printed at London, 1543.

WILLIAM CAXTON was a menial Servant for thirty years together to Margaret, Duchess of Burgundy, (Sister to Edward IV.) in Flanders. Finding, as he says, after his return to England, an imperfect History, he continued it in English, under the Latin Title of Præfatus Temporum. It begins with the first Inhabiting of this Island, and ends (the last year of Edward IV.) 1483. Folio, printed 1555.

JOHN ROUSE, or ROUS, travelled over the greatest part of England; and having made large Collections out of the Libraries where he came, he wrote the History of our Kings, which is still extant in MS in the Cottonian Library. He died in 1491.

His Education.

This would ascend the Throne. And therefore, continues he, care was taken to instruct him in all the parts of Learning necessary for a Prince that was one day to be a Churchman. He would have spoken more justly, if he had only said, that Henry VII had such a design when he first put him upon his Studies. But as the young Prince was become his Heir-apparent at the age of eleven years, it could not be with the same view, that he caused him to pursue the Study of such parts of Learning as were proper for a Clergyman. It is more likely therefore, that the King his Father kept him to his Studies, for fear his active and fiery Spirit should carry him to more dangerous employments. He was only Son of Queen Elizabeth, Heiress of the House of York. Consequently he might have given the King his Father some trouble, had he thought of asserting his right as Heir to his Mother. However this be, Henry having taken a relish for Learning in his younger years, preserved it ever after. He always delighted in perusing good Books, and conversing with the Learned, even when the multitude of his affairs seemed to divert him from such kind of employments. By this means he made advances in the Sciences very uncommon to great Princes. Francis I, his Cotemporary, flattered by the French Historians, the Father of the Muses, was in learning much his inferior. He spoke French and Latin very well and readily. He was perfectly skilled in Musick, as two entire Masses composed by himself, and often sung in his Chapel, do abundantly witness. He was exercised in the most abstruse points of the Aristotelian Philosophy, which alone was in vogue in those days. But he applied himself chiefly to the Study of Divinity, as it was then taught in the Universities, all stuffed with useless questions. Thomas Aquinas's Summary was his favorite book.

This knowledge, which was considered as a great accomplishment, even in ordinary Persons, had upon the young Prince an effect which is not unusual. It gave him a good opinion of himself, which had but too much influence upon all the actions of his Life. The excessive commendations bestowed upon him by all, helped to confirm him in this conceit. When he was yet unexperienced in the affairs of the State, he fancied himself very able; and this presumption was the cause of his being often the Dupe of those Princes with whom he was concerned, as will more amply appear in the sequel of his Reign.

But in remarking that this Prince had a great deal of self-conceit, I don't pretend to rob him of, or any ways lessen the noble qualities he had from Nature or Education. In his youth he was very handsome, and expert in all bodily exercises, as much as, or more than any Prince of his time. Accordingly, he was passionately fond of all those diversions which gave him an opportunity to shew his activity. He was courageous without Offensiveness, of a free and open Temper, an enemy to Fraud and Insincerity, scornful to use indirect means to compass his ends. His Liberality perhaps was as much too great, as the King his Father's Avarice. Henry VII seemed to have been solicitous to accumulate riches, only to afford his Son the pleasure to squander them away without any discretion.

As Henry VIII, when he mounted the Throne, was little experienced in the affairs of the Government, he made use at first of the King his Father's Ministers and Counsellors. The principal were, William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, [and Lord Chancellor of England] of whom honorable mention is made by Erasmus (2) somewhere in

(1) He was born June 28 1493, and came to the Crown July 22. 1509.

(2) Erasmus of Rotterdam came over into England in 1497, and studied some time in Oxford and Cambridge. His Instructions mightily promoted the new Learning, and particularly the Knowledge of the Greek Tongue.

June 7.

In consequence of the Pope's Dispensation, Henry and Catherine were solemnly affianced. Nevertheless, whether Henry VII intended only to deceive Ferdinand, and get the remaining hundred thousand Crowns, or was moved by the Remonstrances of Warham Archbishop of Canterbury concerning this Marriage, he so ordered it, that the Prince his Son on the very day he was fourteen years of age, made in the presence of certain Witnesses, a Protestation in form against the consent he had given. But this Protestation was kept so secret, that it came not to the knowledge of the publick till it was necessary, many years after, to divulge it. Upon the news of Henry VII's death, Ferdinand sent to the Earl of Fuenfajida his Ambassador in England, a very ample power to renew the Treaty of Alliance made with the deceased King, ordering him withal, to demand the Confirmation and Execution of that which was concluded for Catherine's second Marriage with Prince Henry, now become King of England.

The Spanish Ambassador having presented a Memorial upon this occasion, it was deliberated in Council, whether the King should confirm his Marriage with Catherine. This affair was debated with great attention. Against the Marriage it was alledged, that for a Man to marry his Brother's Widow was a thing unheard of among Christians: That such a Marriage was contrary to the Law of God, and therefore it was a question, whether the Pope had power to dispense with it. This was the Archbishop of Canterbury's opinion, who could not forbear considering the Marriage as really incestuous. But Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester was of another mind. He strenuously insisted upon the Pope's Dispensation, and the unlimited power of Christ's Vicar. He affirmed, "That the King's granting a Dispensation, was a certain proof that he had the power, and was sufficient to satisfy the King's Conscience: That no person upon earth could limit, or so much as inquire into the Papal Authority; and though such a power should be ascribed to a General Council, at least the Council of England could not pretend to it." To these Arguments concerning Conscience, the Bishop added others drawn from reasons of State, and the King's particular Interest. He said, "That probably, the King would have, during the course of his reign, many disputes with France, England's old Enemy, and whether he would attack, or only defend, the Alliance with Spain was absolutely necessary: That in sending back the Princess Catherine after having affianced her, he would affront King Ferdinand, which he would certainly revenge by leaguering with France, and such a League could not but endanger England, or at least be extremely expensive to the Nation: That moreover, if the King refused to confirm his Marriage with Catherine, he must resolve either to restore her Dower, or suffer her to enjoy her Settlement: But by marrying her he would save the hundred thousand Crowns received by the King's Father, gain another hundred thousand, which the King of Aragon was to pay, and avoid the great charge he should be at, in marrying another Princess, and conducting her into England. In fine, he enlarged upon the sweet and virtuous Temper of the Princess of Wales, capable of making a Husband perfectly happy." Adding, there was no room to doubt, that the Princess was still a Virgin, since she herself affirmed it, offering even to be tried by Matrons, to shew that she spoke the truth."

All these arguments, except the first concerning the dispensation, were very strong. As to that, it was so dangerous for a Churchman to dispute the Pope's authority, especially such a Pope as Julius II, who was still in his vigour, that the Archbishop of Canterbury durst not persist openly in his opinion. So, the King closing with the Bishop of Winchester's and almost the whole Council's sentiments, it was resolved he should confirm his Marriage. But first he required of the Princess that she should renounce by a solemn Act her Dower of two hundred thousand Crowns, and consent that the sum should belong to the King her Spouse, to be claimed again neither by herself nor Heirs, nor by King Ferdinand her Father, nor Queen Joan her Sister, nor any Person living, on any pretence whatsoever. Two days after, the Earl of Fuenfajida made the like renunciation in the name of King Ferdinand and Queen Joan. Catherine's Letters Patents, wherein she files herself only Princess of Wales, bearing date June the 7th, it is evident, the King married her not on the third of that month, as Historians affirm, nor sooner than the day these Letters were signed. Their Coronation was solemnized on the 24th of the same month, and five days after died Margaret Countess of Richmond and Derby, the King's Grandmother (1).

In the beginning of his Reign, Henry willingly left to his Council and Ministers the care and management of his affairs. As he was in Peace with all his Neighbours, what passed in the Kingdom, could not keep him much employed. He thought only of such pleasures and diversions, as were more suitable to his years, than application to business. But as he was naturally liberal, his entertainments at Court were very expensive. The ancient Bishop of Winchester, Henry VII's old Minister, could not help murmuring to see the Money lavished away without any necessity, which his deceased Master had amassed with so much care, pains and injustice, in which he had himself been employed. He threw all the blame upon the Earl of Surry, Lord Treasurer, who was his rival in favour under the late King, and continued to be so still under the present, by gaining the affection of his new Master by a blind compliance to his Will. During Henry VII's life he was more close, and harder to part with Money than the King himself. How expressively the Orders were for payments, he always found difficulties, and by that means made his Court admirably to his Master. Being continued in his post in the present Reign, he became quite another Man. He not only paid, without examination, whatever was ordered, but also put the King upon spending extravagantly. This gained him the favour of the young Prince, who was naturally addicted to prodigality. The Bishop of Winchester openly blamed this conduct, as highly prejudicial to the King's interest. But he was little regarded, in a Court where every one was striving to make an advantage of the Sovereign's liberal temper. Mean while, his discourses exasperated more and more the Earl of Surry and the young Courtiers against him, who never ceased to do him ill Offices with the King. Thus the Bishop who was in so great credit in the late Reign, gradually lost it in this. His disgrace, which sat heavy upon his mind, threw him upon devising means to supplant his rival, by introducing at Court Thomas Wolsey, whose qualifications he was no stranger to. Wolsey was a Clergyman, already eminent for his merit, though he was but a Butcher's Son of Ipswich. The Bishop of Winchester easily forebore, the King would soon be in want of Persons about him, fit and able to ease him; and as he knew Wolsey's genius, did not question that when he was at Court, he would render himself necessary to the King. To that end, he procured him the place of Almoner. We shall see presently that the Bishop was not mistaken in his Judgment, or rather that his foresight was far short of Wolsey's fortune (2).

About the middle of the year, the Treaties concluded between Henry VII and the King of Scotland, were confirmed or renewed by the Bishop of Murray, who was sent into England to congratulate Henry upon his accession to the Crown.

The Emperor Maximilian sent also an Embassy to Henry, to congratulate him, and confirm the Treaties made with Henry VII in the year 1502.

Christopher Bambridge Archbishop of York, being at Rome, where he was gone to have his Election confirmed, received a Commission from the new King to act as his Ambassador. We shall see presently the reason, why at Rome, the Pope wanted to have an English Ambassador reside at his Court, and why the King was desirous to be particularly informed of what passed at Rome, and in all Italy.

These were the most remarkable occurrences in England during the reign of Henry VII. The first of these was the death of Henry VII, who was succeeded by his son Henry VIII. The second was the marriage of Henry VIII to Catherine of Aragon. The third was the death of Henry VIII, who was succeeded by his son Edward VI. The fourth was the death of Edward VI, who was succeeded by his half-brother John Calvin. The fifth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The sixth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The seventh was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The eighth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The ninth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The tenth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The eleventh was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twelfth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirteenth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The fourteenth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The fifteenth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The sixteenth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The seventeenth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The eighteenth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The nineteenth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twentieth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twenty-first was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twenty-second was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twenty-third was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twenty-fourth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twenty-fifth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twenty-sixth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twenty-seventh was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twenty-eighth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The twenty-ninth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirtieth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirty-first was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirty-second was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirty-third was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirty-fourth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirty-fifth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirty-sixth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirty-seventh was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirty-eighth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The thirty-ninth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The fortieth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The forty-first was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The forty-second was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The forty-third was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The forty-fourth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The forty-fifth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The forty-sixth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The forty-seventh was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The forty-eighth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The forty-ninth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The fiftieth was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The fifty-first was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The fifty-second was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. The fifty-third was the death of John Calvin, who was succeeded by his son John Calvin. (1) She was buried at Westminster. See, p. 437.

(2) Thomas Wolsey was born at Ipswich in March 1471. He was sent to Oxford, that he was Bachelor of Arts at fourteen years of age, and from thence he called the Rede Rede. Soon after he was called Fellow of Magdalen College, and when Master of Arts, had the care of the School adjoining to that College committed to him. Being charged with the Education of the Marquis of Dorset's three Sons, his Lordship presented him to the Rectory of Lymington in Somersetshire, October 10, 1500. He had not long resided at his Living, before Sir Amias Pausanias, a Justice of Peace put him in the Stocks for Highway robbery (as is said), and raising disturbances at a Fair in the Neighbourhood. By the Recommendation of Sir John Nefant he was made one of the King's Chaplains. In 1506, he was invited to the Rectory of Batcombe in the Diocese of Norwich; having then, besides the Rectory of Lymington, the Vicarage of Lyd in Kent. Wolsey's Life Tom. XIII. p. 217. Whilst he was King's Chaplain, he insinuated himself into the favour of Fox Bishop of Winchester, and of Sir Thomas Lovell, who recommended him to the King as a fit Person to be employed in negotiating the Marriage between Henry VII and Margaret Dauphine of Savoy. He was attached to the Emperor her Father, and returned with such speed, that the King seeing him supposed he had not been gone. Having reported his Embassy, he was made Dean of Lewes, February 8, 1508, and on the 20th of the same Month Prebendary of Wilton Brinkell in that Church. In these Circumstances he was when he was introduced at Court by Bishop Fox after Henry VII's death, where he soon found means to insinuate himself into the favour of his Son and Successor, Barnet's High Reg. Fiddle.

1509. Henry VIII. during the first eight months of the Reign of Henry VIII. They were for the most part domestick affairs of little importance, except the King's Marriage, which was attended with very great consequences. But there pursued abroad matters of great moment, which became as it were the source of the troubles wherewith almost all Christendom was agitated for above fifty years, and where-in England was but too much engaged. For some time, the affairs of Europe had begun to have a new face, and what happened this year in Italy put them upon such a foot, as obliged almost every Sovereign to be concerned therein. Henry VIII. unhappily intangled himself in the troubles of that Country, which seem to have had no relation to him. This makes the knowledge of the affairs of Italy so absolutely necessary, that without it neither the events of this Reign can be understood, nor the King's character fully known. It will therefore be proper to enlarge upon this Subject, which concerns not only the History of England, but also those of France, Spain, Germany, Switzerland; the principal events whereof, for a long space of time, flowed properly from the affairs of Italy. It is true, most of the authors who have writ the Histories of these States, supposed their readers to be acquainted with what passed in Italy at the same time. They have thereby much shortened their Works; but withal rendered them very obscure to those who were not so fully instructed as they have supposed. For my part I intend another course. Since the affairs of Italy are the foundation of most of the occurrences in Europe, and particularly in England, during almost one half of the sixteenth Century, I think they ought to be spoken of something largely, which alone can clear the particular Histories proceeding from thence. But to avoid tedious digressions which would be indispensable in the sequel, it is necessary to give first a distinct idea of the state of Italy, by, as well as of the character and interests of the several Princes.

State of Milan, and Naples.

I have already related in the foregoing Reign how Lewis XII. assisted by the Venetians, conquered the Duchy of Milan upon Ludovico Sforza, pretending a right to it as Grandson to Valentina Visconti, Daughter of John Galeazzo I. Duke of Milan. I have likewise had occasion to speak of the Conquest of Naples by the united arms of Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, and of the means used by the last to remain sole Master of that Kingdom. It will suffice therefore to add here, that though Lewis XII. lost his portion of that Conquest, he defisted not from his pretensions, but was waiting for a favorable opportunity to assert them. I must now briefly speak of the other States of Italy, and first of the Ecclesiastical State.

Ecclesiastical State.

Before the Kings of France and Spain had set foot in Italy, the Popes were as Sovereign arbiters of that Country. But it was not so much by their Temporal arms as their Spiritual, of which they made frequent use. For some Centuries past they had lost great part of the Dominions formerly belonging to the Church. About the end of the Reign of Otho I. the Ecclesiastical State consisted of the City of Rome and its Territory, with Tuscany, the Marquisate of Ancona, the Duchy of Spoleto, Ravenna, all La Romagna, and the whole Country in general comprized formerly under the Exarchate (1). But afterwards, during the Wars of the Guelphs and Ghiblins (2), the Emperors wrested from the Popes all Tuscany and several Towns in other parts. Some of these Towns had thought fit to withdraw their obedience from the Church, and the Popes themselves had been forced to grant others in Fee to Lords who served them, or from whom they expected assistance. At length, the Emperor Rodolphus I. having sold liberty to as many Cities of Italy as would purchase it, there were several formerly belonging to the Church that embraced the opportunity, to shake off, at the same time both the Emperor's and the Pope's yoke (3). Hence there were quickly in Italy almost as many Sovereignties as Cities. The strongest subdued the weakest, and fell at last themselves under the Dominion, or rather the Tyranny of some of their own Citizens, who found means to seize the whole power. In this manner were formed in Italy several petty States, out of the ruins of what the ancient Kings of Italy, the Emperors, and the Popes had formerly possessed.

In the Pontificate of Alexander VI. the Ecclesiastical State was reduced within narrower bounds than before, though the Popes had preserved the Sovereignty of several Cities, of which they were no longer Proprietors. Of this number were Ravenna, Bologna, Ferrara, Urbino, Faenza, Rimini, Peruzza, Imola, Cesena, Perugia. Notwithstanding all these losses, they were still very powerful, because their spiritual arms gave them great advantages over their Neighbours. Moreover, besides the revenue of the Ecclesiastical State, they had very considerable incomes from all Christianities.

But when Lewis XII. took possession of the Duchy of Milan, and Ferdinand of the Kingdom of Naples, the affairs of Italy had quite another face. Then the temporal power of the Popes was nothing in comparison of that of these two Monarchs, who besides their Dominions in Italy, had moreover at their command the Forces of two large Kingdoms. On the other hand, the Roman Pontiffs met with much more opposition, when they had a mind to brandish their spiritual weapons, whose force was in proportion to the weakness of those against whom they were darted. For this reason they sought all sorts of means to drive the Foreigners out of Italy. But as they could not by their own strength execute such a design, they were forced to make use of one of these Kings to destroy the other, in which their policy was often deceived. For, they could not humble one, without giving the other a superiority more destructive of their interests, than the equality which was between them before. This for many years was the occasion of all the Pope's intrigues, and withal an incumbrance they could never get clear of. Sometimes they joined with one to pull down the other; sometimes setting them at variance, they remained bare Spectators of the Battle; and sometimes they called in Foreigners to make the balance incline to the side they intended to favour. But whatever was the success of these Wars, the Conqueror ever became very formidable to the Pope and all Italy. It is certain therefore that the Conquests of Naples and Milan gave a mortal wound to the temporal power of the Popes, and were also very prejudicial to their spiritual authority. As the Popes from thenceforward had frequent occasions of quarrel with the Kings of France, now become their Neighbours, they sometimes made use of their spiritual arms, but not with the same success as formerly against the Sovereigns of Italy. As they had to deal with Princes who did not easily bend, they only gave them occasion to examine the grounds of the Papal authority; and this inquiry was not to the advantage of the Popes.

Besides the interest of their See, the Roman Pontiffs had also that of their Family, of which they were no less mindful. Every one of them seeking to raise his Nephews or other Relations; all the Cities formerly belonging to the Church were so many objects that inflamed their desires. Alexander VI. who of all the Popes his Predecessors was the least scrupulous, had formed the design of making Cesar Borgia his Heir and a great Prince, by erecting him a State out of several Cities or States of la Romagna, which still owned the Pope's Sovereignty, and were under his protection. To execute this design it was that Cesar Borgia, either by fraud or force, became master of Perugia, Urbino, Imola, Faenza, Rimini, Peruzza, Cesena, under colour that the Possessors had not been punctual in paying the tribute or annual relief to the Holy See. But Alexander VI. dying before his Son was well settled in his Conquests, it happened, during the short Pontificate of Pius III. and the interval between his death and the election of Julius II. that the former owners of these Cities found means to recover them. This was chiefly by the assistance of the Venetians, who, for their pains, kept Faenza and Rimini.

Julius II. who succeeded Pius III. formed for the House of la Rovere, of which he was, the same projects as Alexander VI. had formed for that of Borgia. He was no sooner in the Papal Chair, but he began the execution of his designs, with imperiously acquainting the Venetians, that his intention was to re-annex to the Church whatever had been alienated, and therefore they must restore Faenza and Rimini. Upon their refusal, he demanded aid of the Emperor Maximilian. This was properly the first rise of the League of Cambray, mentioned in the foregoing Reign, and of which I shall be obliged to speak more fully hereafter.

The Senate of Venice had long passed for the wisest and most politic assembly in the World. By their prudence and abilities they had by degrees formed in Terra firma (4), a State, which, being supported by a very strong naval Force, was inferior to none in Italy. This State consisted of Friuli, Treviso, Verona, Vienza, Padua, Bergamo, Brescia, Crema, Cremona, Reggio, and the whole Polesina, Ravenna, Faenza, Rimini. Most of these Cities with their Territories were formerly part of the King-

The Republic of Venice, and Design of the Venetians to recover the Terra firma.

(1) So was this District formerly called, because it was governed by the Emperor of Constantinople's General in the West, named his Exarch, who resided at Ravenna. The first Exarch was under Justinian in 527, after Belisarius and Narses had driven the Barbarians out of Italy. The last was Eutychius, deposed by Alphonse King of the Lombards in 751. Pepin, King of France, drove him out of the Exarchate, and made himself its Master.

1502. dom of Italy. After that, they fell under the Dominion of the German Emperors, who governed them by their Vicars. At length, either these Vicars were become Sovereigns, or, being expelled, the Cities had recovered their Liberty, to fall again afterwards under the Tyranny of some private Persons, who had usurped an absolute power. Of these the Venetians had acquired them, either by Money or force of arms. But however it be, when they had made these acquisitions, it is certain, the authority of the Emperors was seldom acknowledged. Mean while the Emperors still preserved their pretensions to all these Cities, as having been formerly parts of the Empire, or rather of the Kingdom of Italy, enjoyed by some of their predecessors. Friuli was conquered upon the Church of Aquileia, to whom it was presented by Otho I; Ravenna, Faenza, Rimini, formerly belonged to the See of Rome. Roigo and the Polesin were conquered upon the Duke of Ferrara. Cremona, and Gierradadda, appertained to the Duchy of Milan, having been resigned by Lewis XII. Brescia was taken from the Dukes of Milan, and Crema freely given up by Duke Francis Sforza. They had still in the Kingdom of Naples five Maritime places, mortgaged to them by one of the Kings.

Bologna.

Bologna (1) was a rich and powerful City; but not so considerable as formerly. Civil discords had at length compelled her upon certain terms to submit to the Church. After that, the City was governed by the Pope's Legates, sent thither from time to time. But their Dominion suffered frequent interruptions. The Legates oppressing the People, forced them often to shake off their yoke and expel them the City. But it was only to fall again under the Tyranny of the heads of Faction, who by their oppressions forced them to have recourse to the Pope and receive his Legates again. This is what happened several times. In the year 1440, Hannibal Bentivoglio became so powerful, that he was little less than a Sovereign. From that time to 1506 some one of the Family of Bentivoglio held the Government, though the Pope's Legates were still admitted and honoured, but without having any real power. At last Julius II, not content with this shadow of authority, demanded in 1506, aid of Lewis XII, to make himself master of Bologna. Though France had hitherto protected the Bentivoglio's, Lewis however ordered the Governour of Milan to send the Pope Troops. Whereupon John Bentivoglio, head of that House, seeing himself forsaken by the King of France, quitted Bologna with all his Family, and retired to Milan, leaving the City to the Pope.

Ferrara.
Sarc.

The Duchy of Ferrara (2) was a Fief of the Church, long possessed by the Family of Este, who were invested by the Pope, and paid an yearly relief in Money. This petty State bordering upon the Pope and the Venetians, and being very convenient for both, preserved itself by their mutual jealousy; but however, the Venetians had taken from them Roigo, and the Polesin. But Julius II had greater views, and thought seriously of annexing the whole Duchy to the Church.

Modena and Reggio.
G. Batt.
Vigna.

Modena and Reggio were likewise under the Dominion of the Family of Este, not as belonging to the Duchy of Ferrara, but as a distinct State acquired by that Family after being possessed of Ferrara. Julius II, had also pretensions to these two Cities, as having been formerly given to the Church by Charlemain, and perhaps on the sole pretence, that they belonged to the Duke of Ferrara his Vassal.

Urbino.
Catharelli.

Urbino (3) had formerly been of the Church's domain. But the Popes had not for many years challenged more than the right of Sovereignty. Cesar Borgia had seized this City, and expelled Duke Guidobaldi Ubal dini, who recovered it after the death of Alexander VI. As Guidobaldi had no Children, Julius II persuaded him to adopt Francis Maria de la Rovere, Nephew to both, Son of the Pope's Brother and the Duke's Sister. Shortly after, la Rovere became Duke of Urbino, by the death of Guidobaldi his adoptive Father.

Parma and Placentia.
Alberti.

Parma and Placentia had been under the dominion of several Lords or Tyrants, till at last they became subject to the Dukes of Milan. Lewis XII took possession of them after his Conquest of the Milanese.

Florence.
Medicaval.

Florence, a very potent City, and the chief of Tuscany, was fallen at length under the Dominion of the Family of Medici. But afterwards an opposite Faction prevailing, they were driven from thence, and were now in exile, attempting however from time to time to be restored to their Country.

Pisa.
Alberti.

Pisa had been formerly a very considerable City by reason of her naval Forces; but at length becoming subject to the Dukes of Milan, a Bastard of that Family, to whom it was given, sold it to the Florentines. The Pisani were against the Sale, and would have recovered their Liberty, but were overcome. After that, Charles VIII, in his way to Naples, restored Pisa to her Liberty; but as soon as the Florentines had nothing more to fear from him, they besieged Pisa, though assisted by the Venetians, and the Siege was still carrying on at the time of the League of Cambrai.

The City of Genoa, after sundry Revolutions caused by the Factions of the Fregossis, and the Adornis, was at length fallen into the hands of the French, in the reign of Charles VII. After that, Lewis XI resigned it to the Duke of Milan, and Lewis XII seized it after his Conquest of the Milanese.

This Survey of the States of Italy shows, that it was then divided between six Powers, namely, Pope Julius II, Lewis XII King of France and Duke of Milan, Ferdinand King of Aragon and Naples, the Republics of Venice and Florence, and the Duke of Ferrara. To these six may be added, the Emperor Maximilian, who without possessing a foot of land in Italy, had however pretensions to whatever was formerly enjoyed by the Emperors, and particularly to the firm Land State of the Venetians, whose ruin the other six were equally concerned to procure. The Emperor pretended, that all the Venetian Dominions belonged to the Empire; he passionately desired to wrest some place from them that would give him entrance into Italy, and an opportunity to re-establish the Imperial power in that Country. Julius II, as I said, had formed a project to annex to the Church, whatever had been alienated, and especially the Duchy of Ferrara, and the Towns of la Romagna. This design could be effected only by the destruction of the Venetians, ever attentive to oppose the growth of their Neighbours. Besides, the Pope had a mind to begin with them, and wrest from them Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimini. Lewis XII repented of yielding to them Cremona and Gierradadda. He wanted to dispossess them, and under that pretence, to get possession also of Crema, Bergama, and Brescia, and in general of whatever had belonged to the Dukes of Milan. Ferdinand was desirous to recover without Money, the five maritime Towns of the Kingdom of Naples which had been mortgaged to them. Moreover, his Interest required, that there should be always troubles in Italy, to hinder Lewis XII from thinking of the Conquest of Naples. The Duke of Ferrara wished to recover Roigo, and the Polesin. Lastly, the Florentines, obstinately bent upon the Siege of Pisa, protected and defended by the Venetians, could desire nothing more advantageous than to see that Republic unable to assist the Pisani.

Such were the motives of the League formed against Venice, of which the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of France were the chief promoters. For the greater Security, they spread a report, that the Emperor, as Guardian to Charles of Austria his Grandson, had agreed, that his differences with the Duke of Gueldres should be amicably adjusted. To that purpose, the City of Cambrai was appointed for the place of Congress, thereby to intimate, that the affairs only of Flanders would be considered. Here the famous League against the Republic of Venice was concluded; and the better to deceive the Spies, was signed at first a Treaty of perpetual Peace between the Pope, the Emperor, Lewis XII, and Ferdinand, which was indeed made publick. But a second Treaty, which care was taken not to divulge, contained a League offensive and defensive against the Venetians, the principal Articles whereof were as follows:

In the first place it was set forth in the Preamble, that the Turks having begun to make great progress in Europe, it was absolutely necessary for the Christian Princes to join their Forces against them, but that the Venetians, by their continual Incroachments, greatly obstructed this Union. From thence it was concluded, that they were to be dispossessed of what they had usurped. This was the pious motive of the League. And therefore it was agreed, that of their spoils, the Pope should have Ravenna, Faenza and Rimini; the Emperor, as such, Vercina, Vicenza, and Padua; and as Duke of Austria, Treviolo, and Friuli; Lewis XII, as Duke of Milan, Cremona, Gierradadda, Brescia, Crema, and Bergama: The King of Aragon, Manfredonia, Trani, Monsopoli, Brindisi, and Otranto in the Kingdom of Naples; that the Dukes of Ferrara and Savoy, and the Marquis of Mantua should be admitted into the League if they desired it; the first to recover Roigo, and the Polesin; the second, to get the Kingdom of Cyprus out of the hands of the Venetians; and the third, to obtain satisfaction concerning certain Pretensions he had 1509. upon Venice. Lastly, that all who had any claim upon the Venetians, should be received into the League as principals, if they declared themselves within three months. Thus, in order to wage war against the Turks, no other means were found, than to strip the Venetians of all their firm Land State, and leave them only the single City of Venice.

To accomplish this design, it was agreed, that the King of France in person should enter the Territories of the Venetians, the first of April, in the year 1509, with an army of forty thousand Men: That the Pope should send an army into la Romagna; and Ferdinand have one in Lombardy, with a Fleet in the Gulf; and the Emperor attack the Venetians from the side of Germany. But as he had lately made a three years Truce with them, an admirable expedient was devised to furnish him with a pretence to break it, which was, that the Pope should summon him as the Church's Advocate, to come and defend the Patrimony. In fine, Julius II engaged to thunder out all the Ecclesiastical Censures against Venice. This League was signed at Cambray, December 10th, 1508.

The time of executing the projects of the League being come, Lewis XII departed from Milan the beginning of April 1509, at the head of forty thousand Men, whilst the Pope's army entered la Romagna under the Conduct of Francis Maria de la Roovere Duke of Urbino, and Raymond of Gardona threw himself into Lombardy with the King of Aragon's Troops. At the same time, the Duke of Ferrara took the Field in the Polisina. But the Emperor contented himself with keeping at Trent, and seeing the rest of the Allies act, in order to be ready to reap the fruit of their labours. Mean while, the Venetians, having first provided their Towns with Ammunition, raised an army, under the command of Count Piagliano their General, whose Lieutenant was Barbaltomew d'Alviano.

The Van of the French army commanded by Chaumont, passed the Adige the 15th of April, and at the same time the Pope excommunicated the Venetians, and put the City of Venice under an Interdict. On the 14th of May was fought the Battle of Gioradadda or Agnadel (1), between the French and Venetians, contrary to the opinion of Count Piagliano, though General in chief of the Venetians, and to all reason. For the Venetians having no refuge but their army, it was by no means proper to hazard a Battle. But the heat of Barbaltomew d'Alviano prevailed over his General's Prudence. The Venetian army was entirely routed, and Alviano taken Prisoner. Whereupon the Venetians being no longer able to resist their Enemies, Lewis in less than a Fortnight became master of Cresona, Peschiera, Crema, Brescia, Bergamo, and of all the places in general, formerly belonging to the Milanese. Moreover Vicenza, Verona, and Padua, sent him their Keys. But as by the Treaty of Cambray, these places were in the Emperor's division, he sent their Deputies to him. Maximilian was then at Trent expecting the Success of the confederate Arms. Upon the arrival of the Deputies, he ordered his Troops to advance towards the State of Venice, and as these Cities freely opened their Gates, had only to garrison them. Trevise alone refused him admittance, and remained firm to the Venetians, though reduced to the last extremity. Friuli and the Towns of Sicilia followed the stream, and submitted to the Emperor. On the other hand, the Duke of Urbino, with the Pope's army, took Ravenna, Cervia, Faenza, Rimini, whilst the Duke of Ferrara became master of Rovigo, and the Marquis of Mantua of some Castles which were convenient for him. Thus, in a moment, the Venetians saw all their Dominions reduced to the single City of Venice, with five places in the Kingdom of Naples, which could not be of great Service to them. Mean while, they were not entirely discouraged amidst so many Calamities, though the Senate and People were under the greatest Confirmation. Their chief care was to draw together their scattered Troops, and use their endeavours to break off destructive a League.

The misfortune befallen the Venetians occasioned the loss of Pisa. This City despairing of being relieved by Venice, or the King of France, who had deferred her at last, surrendered to the Florentines, after having endured a long Siege.

Lewis XII having compassed his ends, returned into France, after he had detached a Body of his Troops, under the Command of la Palisse to join the Emperor, who probably, had not Men enough to supply his Garrisons, and to keep an army in the Field against the Venetians, who were drawing together again. Upon the King of France's departure, affairs began to have a new face. The Venetians took Padua by surprise, and kept it over their Enemies. Moreover they found means to send into France an army which employed the greatest part of the Emperor's Troops. In short, they appeased the Pope to the tolerable Submission, and obtained his promise to grant them Absolution, and take off the Interdict upon certain Conditions which they could not refuse him. On the other hand, Ferdinand, who had not yet repaid any debt by the League, was called upon by the Duke of the five Cities held by the Venetians in the Kingdom of Naples.

Whilst the Senate was labouring to draw off the Pope and King of Aragon from the League, Maximilian with his own and la Palisse's Forces, laid Siege to Padua, but after an unsuccessful Assault, raised it, and retired into Germany. At the same time the French General who returned to Milan, by which means the Venetians had time to breathe a little, and continue with the Pope Negotiations, which made them hope the issue of the war would not be so fatal as they had hitherto apprehended.

The Union of the King of France with the Emperor, made Julius II extremely uneasy. He beheld the French King too firmly settled in the Duchy of Milan, than it seemed possible to dislodge him. On the other hand, the Emperor could not but be formidable to him, since he had an entrance into Italy, by means of Ferrara and Modena. He did not know what to think of the powerful and just that Prince by Lewis XII, to complete the ruin of the Venetians, and he was not without reason, that these two Monarchs had made a private Treaty, to support all Italy. Mean while, he hardly saw how these two formidable Potentates could well be without any other aim come to nothing. The Venetians were distressed by the long Pisan War. As for the King of Aragon it was almost impossible to treat with him, without being liable to be deceived. He knew how to improve all the Treaties, and scrupled not to forsake his Allies, when it was for his Interest. Notwithstanding all these difficulties, the Pope formed the project of putting the affairs of Italy upon another foot, in order to execute his first designs. He resolved therefore to agree and league with the Venetians; to take off Ferdinand from the league of Cambray, by inveigling him with Naples; to use his endeavours to set the Emperor and King of France at variance; to bring a Swiss Army into the Milanese; in a word, to perjure the new King of England to make a diversion in France. These were the Pope's projects, the Success whereof we shall see hereafter. He began with making peace with the Venetians, upon three Conditions. First, that they should desist from all their pretensions to the Cities of la Romagna, lately taken from them. Secondly, that they should renounce the right of placing in Bologna a certain Magistrate called Bisdomina. Thirdly, that they should leave the Navigation of the Gulf free to all the Subjects of the Church. In the present circumstances of Venice, there were no other Conditions to be imposed upon her.

After so long a digression concerning the affairs of Italy, which however is not useless, as will appear in the Sequel, we must return to the affairs of England.

The Parliament being assembled the 21st of January 1510, the Commons represented to the King, that certain Statutes made in the former Parliament, had given occasion to the King's Father's Ministers, to oppress the people, by putting forced Interpretations upon them, contrary to the natural meaning of the words: That therefore it was necessary to soften, or to explain them, as to prevent such abuses for the future (2). Henry readily agreed to what was proposed by the Commons, not only because the thing was just in itself, but chiefly because it naturally led to his design of having Empson and Dudley attainted by the Parliament. Though these Men had been already condemned by their proper Judges, the King had deferred the execution of the sentence. He could not help having some scruple, for causing them to be accused of a Crime of which he knew them not to be guilty. Nevertheless he wanted to sacrifice them to the people, without incurring the Imputation of a false Accusation, and withal to vindicate his Father's memory, by intimating, that they had exceeded his orders.

(1) Called also the Battle of Rustla.

(2) The benefit of Forfeiture to penal Laws was also reduced to the Term of three years next preceding. There was likewise a Statute Law made in the 3d of Henry VII, that a person exiled in Apparel repeated, and a more decent one interrogated, Barbott, p. 6. It having been enacted in the 3d of Henry VII, that a person should have for his Fee, upon every Inquisition taken upon view at the body slain and murdered, thirteen Shilling and Fourpence; the Countess should have for his Fee, upon every Inquisition taken upon view at the body slain and murdered, thirteen Shilling and Fourpence; which was contrary to the common Law, and the intent of the time before of Henry VI. It was therefore now enacted, That upon a Request made to a Justice, to come and inquire upon the view of any person slain, deceased, or otherwise died by violence, that the said Justice should signify unto the body of every such Person or Persons, without taking any fee for it, that he go to every Coroner that will not endeavor to find out the body of such slain person, or that take any thing for the doing of it, but every time to take ten shilling. cile these two things, he so managed it, that the Parliament passed an Act of Attainder against them; that is, they were condemned to dye by the Authority of the King and Parliament, without any particular mention of the crimes they had incurred, or of the proofs upon which their Sentence was founded. This method, which till then had been seldom practised, was but too frequently used in the Sequel of this Reign; so dangerous is it to establish such Precedents. Mean while, Henry having still more difficulty to overcome his scruples, delayed their execution till the following August (1).

New Treaty of Alliance by which Lewis XI and Henry VIII.

Whilst the Parliament was thus employed, Lewis XII, sent Ambassadors to England to renew with the King the Treaties made with Henry VII. As by the Peace of Esclaples, after the death of one of the two Kings of France or England, his Successor was to signify to the Survivor, whether he would continue the Alliance, it was Henry's Business to inform Lewis XII of his Intention. However, he had done nothing towards it. But as he was a lively young Prince, and abounding in riches, Lewis thought doubtless it would be proper to prevent him, for fear he might engage in designs destructive of the welfare of France. His Ambassadors therefore concluded with Henry a new Treaty of Alliance, wherein the former Treaties were not mentioned. By this it was agreed, that the Peace between the two Kings should last till the death of the shortest liver: That it should be confirmed by the States-General of France, and the Parliament of England: That each of the two Kings should take care to obtain the Pope's approbation, with a previous Sentence of Excommunication against the first Violator.

There was nothing said in this new Treaty of the 745000 Crowns that Charles VIII had promised to pay to Henry VII, or his Successors, and for which Lewis XII himself was engaged by a subsequent Treaty, because the Business was only to renew the Peace between the two present Kings. However, Henry forgot not to secure the debt, by requiring of Lewis Letters Patents, wherein he promised to pay the Arrears by means of twenty-five thousand Livres every six months, till the whole was discharged. After which the Peace was ratified and sworn by both the Kings.

The Pope sends Henry a consecrated Relic.

Julius II was meditating great designs against Lewis XII. The Success of the League of Cambray, though he had turned it to his advantage, made him very uneasy. He saw the French more firmly settled in Italy than ever, and Lewis XII better able to protect the Duke of Ferrara. To accomplish his projects against France, he doubtless wanted assistance; and to that end, tried to excite all the States of Europe against that Kingdom, as will be seen presently. So, to insinuate himself into the King of England's favour, he sent him this year the Golden Rose, which the Pope, after solemnly consecrating it, were wont to present to some Prince (2). Probably also, the King of Arragon, in concert with the Pope, began now to take measures to engage Henry his Son-in-law in a League against France.

Ferdinand falls off from the League.

The success of the last Campaign made the King of Arragon no less uneasy than the Pope. He was sensible, Lewis never loved him, nor had any reason to love him, and saw this enmity, since the ruin of the Venetians, in a condition to disturb him in the possession of Naples. On the other hand, the League of Cambray could not procure him any further advantages, whereas the offers made him to leave it were very considerable. The Venetians agreed to restore him the Cities they possessed in the Kingdom of Naples, and the Pope was willing to depart from his claim of forty thousand crowns, and give him the investiture of that Kingdom for a Spanish Genet only. This was sufficient to induce him to break his engagements at Cambray. In all appearance, ever since the end of the last year, he had taken measures with the Pope to form a new League against France. But as he never acted openly, he desired these measures to be kept private, in order to attack Lewis the more irresistibly. To that purpose, on the 6th of January this year 1516, he commissioned Lewis de Carné of Villaragud, his Ambasador at London, to treat with Henry VIII about a stricter Alliance than had yet been concluded between the Crowns of England and Spain.

Whether Henry could not so soon resolve to conclude this new Alliance with Ferdinand, or was willing first to finish his affairs with Lewis XII, it was not till the 24th of May that the new Treaty was signed. It was only a defensive Alliance between the two Kings, with a promise of mutual aid upon occasion. But Ferdinand, who had his views, caused these words to be inserted: That in case one of the two Kings was attacked by any Prince whatsoever, the other should be obliged to proclaim and wage War against the aggressor, though he should be his Ally. That if one was attacked by the King of France, the other should be obliged to go against him in person with a powerful Army. This Treaty secured to Ferdinand the Kingdom of Naples, because it Lewis XII had intended to undertake the Conquest, the diversion, he would have been threatened with from England, would have infallibly kept him from his purpose. But it is hard to conceive what advantage Henry could reap from such a Treaty, since it was not likely, Lewis designed to attack him; so that all the advantage was on Ferdinand's side. It must be either that Henry's Ministers were not very clear-sighted, or he, from a motive of generosity for a Father-in-law, whom he did not yet sufficiently know, was imprudently perverted to this proceeding, the more strange, as he had lately renewed the Peace with France.

But it must not be thought that Henry was then a complete Politician. He was yet young, and minded his diversions more than the publick affairs. There was nothing every day but Tournaments, Balls, Entertainments, Conquests of Musick, which consumed by degrees the eighteen hundred thousand pounds Sterling, found in the King his Father's Coffers (3). He used likewise to play at Tennis and Dice with certain strangers who cheated him of his Money, which he discovered at last, and though a little too late, shamefully chased them from Court. He was so passionately fond of Musick, that it devoured great part of his time; which, added to the hours he spent in his Studies and other diversions, left him but little leisure to apply himself to the affairs of the Government, the management whereof he willingly left to his Ministers. And therefore it may be affirmed, that in matter of Policy, never Prince committed greater faults, or was more imposed upon than himself, especially in the first years of his Reign.

Wolsey, &c. at Court.

Whilst Henry was wholly addicted to his pleasures, there was a Person gradually rising at Court, who was one day to have an absolute power over him, and to manage all his affairs as well foreign as domestick. I mean Thomas Wolsey, who was made the King's Almoner last year, and in the beginning of this Dean of Lincoln (4). It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that on the 30th of January the King gave him a House in London (5) formerly Emplon's, no inconsiderable present, since the Patent mentions thirteen Gardens belonging thereto. We must now return to the affairs of Italy, which will afford us farther matter for several years.

Julius II had two grand designs in his head. The first was to seize the Duchy of Ferrara; the second to expel the French and Germans out of Italy. His Forces alone not being capable to execute these projects, it was necessary to use the assistance of some other Princes, and try to engage them in his designs. His scheme was to league with the Venetians; to take off Ferdinand and Maximilian from the interests of France; to break the League of Cambray; to persuade the King of England to make a diversion in France; to excite the Switzers to invade the Duchy of Milan. He executed all these projects, but not without encountering great difficulties as would have discouraged any Man less resolute than himself. First, he made a private League with the Venetians, after which he solemnly gave them Abolution the 24th of January. Then, he secretly agreed with Ferdinand by promising him the Investiture of Naples. That done, he quarrelled with Lewis XII, by filling a Bishoprick in Provence, with

He had also the Art of attaching so effectually those to his Interests, in whole company the King did not deign, that they were always ready to forward his Views. Being of a gay, facetious, and open Temper, he would divert himself with them in such Exercises (says Polydore Vergil), as were most agreeable to the Levity and Passions of Youth, and which did not perfectly suit with the Character of a Dean in the Church. He would defend in Song, laugh, rally, and even dance with them, as if for the time he had quite laid aside that Severity of Behaviour which became his State in. Hist. Ref. Vol. I. p. 8.

He calls it a Synod, which Lewis calls a Council. His League with the Venetians being publicly known, he imperiously commanded the Duke of Ferrara to renounce the League of Cambray, and join his Arms with those of the Church. The Duke not believing, his being Vassal to the Holy See obliged him to be thus blindly devoted to the Pope's humours, refused to break his Alliance with France, and so gave his Holiness the pretence he had long been seeking. When the Duke offered to pay him the Tribute due to the Church for the Fief of Ferrara, the Pope refused it, plainly intimating by that refusal, he intended to confiscate the Duchy.

Ferdinand and Lewis. Mean while, Ferdinand was privately acting with Henry VIII his Son-in-law, to draw him into the Pope's interests, which was become his own, in consequence of the Projects they had formed in common. But his practices were so secret, that Lewis XII never mistrusted him. On the contrary, he entirely confided in the assurances given him by his Ambassador, that his design was to continue firmly attached to the League of Cambray.

The Pope for the Swissers. On the other hand, Julius II gained the Bishop of Sion (1), who having great credit among the Switzers found means to let them at variance with France, by persuading them to demand an augmentation of their pensions. Their Alliance with that Crown being about to expire, they required to renew it, that their pensions might be increased. Lewis refusing it, the Bishop of Sion effectually used that refusal to stir them up against France, to which the King himself also contributed by making an Alliance with the Grisons. He thereby so provoked the Switzers, that in a Diet at Lucern they declared for the Pope, and resolved to send an Army into the Duchy of Milan.

He tries to reconcile the Venetians to the Emperor. In fine, the Pope forgot nothing that he thought capable of persuading the Venetians to agree with the Emperor at any rate, even to the advising them to deliver him Trevizo and Padua. He intimated to them, that the most effectual means to drive the French out of the Milanese, was to disengage the Emperor from their interests; and when once they were out of Italy, it would be easy to wrest from the Emperor not only Trevizo and Padua, but all his other Conquests too. But the Venetians durst not run such a hazard.

Lewis XII begins to suspect the Pope. Such were the vast projects of the Pope. He was so private in his Negotiations, that Lewis XII imagining he had no other design than to seize Ferrara, contented himself with ordering Chaumont, Governor of Milan, to aid the Duke in case he was attacked. But shortly after, a Venetian Fleet, and Papal Army commanded by Fabrizius Colonna attempting, though unsuccessfully, to surprize Genoa, Lewis had but too much reason to suspect, there was some grand design formed against him; and therefore, sent Chaumont orders to have an eye to the Pope's proceedings.

Julius II is like to be surprized at Bologna. These orders came to Milan very seasonably. Julius II really intended to besiege Ferrara, and for that purpose was come to Bologna, till an Army, prepared on some pretence by Raymond of Cardona at Naples was ready to join him and the Venetian Troops. But Chaumont did not allow him time to execute his projects. Hearing the Pope was arrived at Bologna, he departed from Milan at the head of an Army, and made such speed that he would have surprized the Pope there, had he not suffered himself to be amused with parleys. Whilst he was treating with the Pope's Envoys, some Venetian Troops in the Neighbourhood entering the City, secured it from the danger of being insulted. Whereupon Chaumont, being wholly unprepared for so important a Siege was obliged to retire.

He communicates the French Generals, and tries to surprize Genoa. Julius II made great noise at this insult of the French, and filled all Europe, and particularly the Court of England, with his clamours. He excommunicated all the Generals of the French Army, and presently after, his and the Venetian Gallies made a second attempt upon Genoa, but with no better success than before.

He sends orders to the Swissers. At the same time, twelve thousand Switzers began their march in order to enter the Milanese, under the conduct of the Bishop of Sion. But he found the passages so well guarded, that they despaired of succeeding in their design. So, not receiving returns from the Pope the Money promised them, they returned into their own Country.

Lewis XII joins with the Emperor. War being thus proclaimed between Lewis XII and the Pope, Lewis thought himself under no farther restraint.

He had done his utmost to be reconciled with him, even to the offering to abandon the Duke of Ferrara. But the Pope, depending upon Ferdinand, and expecting great assistance from England, had evaded all his proposals. Wherefore, to stop the fury of this impetuous old Man; Lewis made a new League with the Emperor, promising to put him in possession of all Italy, except Genoa and Florence. Maximilian had the good fortune, that in all his Leagues he had ever great advantages, though he contributed the least. On this occasion, Lewis XII could hardly proceed without him, because it was absolutely necessary to continue the War in the State of Venice, otherwise the Venetians would have been able to give the Pope too great an assistance. The League being concluded at Blais in August, Lewis called a Synod at Tours, to consult how he ought to behave to the Pope. The Synod were of opinion, that the King should once more offer the Pope a reasonable agreement; and in case of refusal, might with a safe conscience wage even an offensive War with him. Lewis wanted no more to justify his intended proceedings. Presently after, he concluded with Maximilian a new Treaty, whereby they agreed to cause a General Council to be summoned to Pisa, to depose Julius II. To that end, they gained nine Cardinals, who readily undertook to call the Council in their own name. Some of these Cardinals were now with the Pope, but found means to leave him under divers pretences, and when he would have recalled them, refused to obey.

Such was the situation of the affairs of Italy during the year 1510. I have said nothing of the events of the War which continued all this while between the Emperor, assisted by the French King, and the Venetians, because these particulars are of little service to this History. It will suffice to observe, that Chaumont seeing Genoa and Milan in danger, had withdrawn the French Troops from the Emperor's Army to keep them at Milan. The departure of these Troops gave the Venetians some respite, who thereby were enabled to repair some losses sustained in the beginning of the Campaign, and to assist the Pope who still designed to besiege Ferrara.

Chaumont's attempt to surprize the Pope in Bologna. The Pope's affords Raymond of Cardona, Viceroy of Naples, a pretence to march to the relief of his Holiness. The Pope's Troops and the Venetians were, in December, joined by the Spanish Army near Modena, which Fabrizius Colonna had taken in his return from his Genoa expedition. Though the season was not very proper to enter upon action, the Pope was absolutely bent to besiege Mirandola. This Town belonged to the Heirs of Jaumes Picus of Mirandola, with whom he had no quarrel. But as it lay convenient to favour the Siege of Ferrara, he would not leave it in his rear, but ordered it to be vigorously attacked. In spite of his age, and the rigour of the Season, he came himself to the Siege, to animate the Troops by his presence; and the Town surrendering at last on the 20th of January, was pleased to enter through the breach.

Lewis XII complained to Ferdinand of his assisting the Pope. But Ferdinand calling that a trifle, replied, that as Vassal of the Holy See he could not help defending his Holiness's Person and State: That besides, he was not concerned in the quarrels of the Pope and the King of France, but his intention was to keep to the Articles of the League of Cambray.

Hitherto Henry does not seem to be concerned with the affairs of Italy, though the Pope, Ferdinand and the Venetians had formed a design to engage him therein. He peaceably led a life of pleasure, without much regarding what passed abroad. On the 1st of January 1511, he had the satisfaction to see his Queen delivered of a Prince, at whose birth there was great rejoicing over all the Kingdom. But the joy lasted not long, since the young Prince died before the end of February (2).

Mean while, Ferdinand was seeking means to engage Henry in the League he intended to make with the Pope against France. Henry was rich and powerful, and consequently his junction to the League would be of great weight, and extremely incommode France. On the other hand, his youth and small experience made his Father-in-law hope, it would not be impracticable to engage him by degrees, and insensibly, into projects which a King of England ought not to concern himself with. It is certain, Ferdinand was now in agreement with the Pope. All his proceedings, and the several circumstances of History, render it so evident that it cannot be doubted. However, he used a profound dissimulation in this respect. He designed to intend only the peace of Europe, that all the Princes of Christendom might join together in

(1) Or Palais, lying betwixt Switzerland, the Milanese, the Valley of Alpi and Savoy.
(2) He was born at Barrois, and christened Hen. He was presented to the King by his Queen as a New-year's Gift, but died this same year, on February 22, and was buried at Windsor. Habert, p. 7. Hall, tom. II.

1511. a War against the Infidels. But as he wanted an Army and Fleet to execute his designs, he pretended to have very much at heart the continuance of the War he had undertaken against the Moors. He had sent last year upon the Coasts of Africa, a Fleet commanded by Peter of Navarre. Shortly after, he reinforced it with some Troops under the conduct of a Son of the Duke of Alva, who attempting to land at Gelves, was slain, and all his Men cut in pieces. Ferdinand made use of this ill success to cover his preparations against France. Under colour of being revenged on the Moors, he assembled an Army, and equipped a Fleet, which he pretended to send into Africa, but was however designed for Italy. As it was not yet time to discover his intentions, he carried his dissimulation so far, as to demand of the King his Son-in-law a thousand English Archers to serve in this pretended expedition. Weak aid! to be sent for so far and at so great charge, if he had really intended to use them. Henry, not perceiving his designs, readily complied with his request, and appointed Sir Thomas Darcy, on whom, at the same time, he conferred the title of Baron (1), to command that small body (2). We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, Ferdinand's Letter of thanks to Henry (3) for this aid, and for his advice not to hazard his Person in the undertaking: Advice, continued he, that he could not follow, because Religion was concerned. And yet, it soon appeared, he had never intended any such thing, since he employed against France the very Forces which seemed to be designed against the Moors (4).

Nothing more was wanting to conclude the projected League against Lewis XII, but to gain the King of England. This was strenuously endeavoured during the beginning of the Year 1511. The Venetians sent him an Ambassador, under colour of thanking him for his care to reconcile them to the Pope, desiring him withal, in their Credentials dated the 2d of March, to give credit to what their Ambassador should impart to him, which could relate only to the intended League. About the same time it was, that the Pope conferred the Dignity of Cardinal upon Christopher Bambridge Archbishop of York, and Ambassador at Rome, in a Promotion the 11th of March at Ravenna. All the Historians unanimously affirm, Bambridge was made Cardinal, purely for labouring to set Henry at variance with France. Matthew Skinner Bishop of Sim, was promoted to the same honour for his past and future Services of the like nature. In those days, it was neither Learning nor Virtue that raised Clergymen to the Cardinalate, but solely their Abilities in temporal Affairs, joined to an entire Submission to the Pope.

The endeavours that were used to engage Henry in the Italian League, had at length the expected Success. In all appearance, it was represented to him, that he was highly concerned to oppose the progress of the King of France, who was already become too powerful by the Conquest of the Duchy of Milan, and the ruin of the Venetians. However this be, it appears that about the middle of the year, Henry was now determined to follow the Suggestions of the Pope and Ferdinand. For in June he appointed Commissioners, to take care that the Militia of the Kingdom were provided with good Arms, and ready to serve upon the first notice, which it was customary to order only when a war was foreseen. The reason alleged by the King for these orders, plainly shew what was his design. He said, though the Kingdom was in perfect Tranquillity, nevertheless, as the Arms were commonly suffered to rust in time of Peace, he wished that his Subjects would be in a readiness to serve him, as well against Invasions, if any were intended, as in defence of his Allies. These last words could respect only the Pope, the King of Arragon, and the Venetians; from whence it may be inferred, that the King had now given his word. But the Sequel will shew it still more clearly.

The antient and strict Union between France and Scotland, gave Henry just cause to fear, that as soon as the war with France was begun, the King of Scotland, as Ally of Lewis XII, would interpose in the quarrel. And therefore, to remove all pretence of rupture, he took care to appoint Commissioners (5) with power, to repair all the outrages committed since the late Peace. But his precautions proved ineffectual. An accident this year, afforded the King of Scotland afterwards that pretence of Breach which Henry would have prevented.

Andrew Breton, a Scotch Merchant, complaining to the King of Scotland, that the Portuguese had killed his Father, and seized his Ship, the King gave him Letters of Mart, after having in vain sought redress from the Court of Portugal. Whereupon, Breton equipped two stout Ships, and found means to make himself ample amends for his losses, by falling upon all the Portugal Ships trading to Flanders and England. The Portugal Ambassador residing at London, complained to the Council, and represented, that since the King of England pretended to the Sovereignty of the narrow Seas, it was but reasonable he should protect the foreign Ships that came into the Channel. Upon this Complaint, the King equipped two large Men of War, and appointed the two Sons of the Earl of Surrey (6) to command them, with orders to take the Scotch Pirate. These two Lords watched him so narrowly, that they met with him at last, as he was returning from Flanders to Scotland. Breton fought desperately, but was killed in the fight, and his two Ships taken and brought into England (7). The King of Scotland hearing of this, sent and demanded the two Ships, with speedy reparation of the outrage committed against the Peace. The Ambassadors were told, that Pyrates were not included in the Peace, and that to punish such people according to their deserts was no breach of Treaty. Probably, Breton had made himself more than amends for the damage he had sustained, as it too frequently happens on such occasions. But however King James not being able to obtain any thing from the Court of England, protested against the Injustice, being determined to resent it the first opportunity.

I left Julius II, after the taking of Mirandola, bent upon the Siege of Ferrara, and only waiting the return of good Weather. Though Lewis XII was in good measure ignorant of what passed in Spain and England, he knew however enough not to doubt that the Pope was endeavouring to raise him enemies on all sides. He was even satisfied, that though he seemed to have no other design than to become master of Ferrara, yet that was only the first Step to some greater project. Mean while, he was very much embarrassed. He had properly nothing to gain upon the Pope, unless he would seize the Church's Patrimony. But he had a great deal to lose, besides the troubles which the obdurate and haughty Temper of the Pope might create him. Wherefore he resolved to try all possible ways to be reconciled with him. To that end, whilst the Pope was employed in the Siege of Mirandola, he made him some overtures by Chaumont; but it was to no purpose. The Pope would hearken to nothing, and continued the Siege till he forced the Town to capitulate. At last, Lewis seeing there was no hopes of a reconciliation, ordered Chaumont to regard him no longer, and at any rate support the Duke of Ferrara. Chaumont receiving these orders, takes the Field in the midst of winter. His army, joined by the Duke of Ferrara, was not so numerous as the Forces of the Pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians; but composed of so good Troops, that the Allies durst never hazard a Battle, though it was offered them more than once. Mean while, the Pope was greatly embarrassed. Instead of quietly preparing for the Siege of Ferrara, he was forced to keep the Field during the winter, without knowing even how to save Modena, which was in danger of a Siege. Ferdinand, who foreknew what trouble that place would give the Pope, had advised him to resign it to the Emperor. Nay, that affair had been negotiated, but without Success, because Maximilian would receive it only as a place held of the Empire, to which the Pope would not consent. At last, upon Chaumont's approach to besiege it, the Pope was willing to deliver it as the Emperor desired, because it was not to be saved without venturing a Battle. The Terms of this bargain are not precisely known.

1511. But from thenceforward all the Emperor's proceedings gave occasion to suspect, Modena was acquired upon Conditions very prejudicial to the King of France his Ally.

Ferdinand's
Dignification
The King of Aragon pretended to be in Alliance with France. He would not declare against her till he had secured the King of England, with whom he was privately negotiating a Treaty which required a long discussion. Indeed, his Troops which were to serve the Pope but three months, according to the terms of the Investiture of Naples, were still joined with those of the Allies. But he pretended, the Viceroy of Naples acted contrary to his orders, in remaining in the Pope's army longer than he was commanded. Mean while, the Army was pressed by Chaumont and the Duke of Ferrara, who followed them close, and endeavoured to provoke them to a Battle. So, to gain time, Ferdinand, who would still pass for a neutral Prince, and well affected to the repose of Italy, proposed a Congress at Mantua for a Peace. The Pope immediately accepted the overture. The Emperor agreed to it likewise, and Lewis XII durst not reject it, lest he should be charged with being the sole Author of the troubles of Italy. It is certain, if, at this juncture, instead of suffering himself to be amused by a Negotiation, the sole aim whereof was to rob him of the opportunity of pushing his enemies, he had ordered his Troops to advance, he would have over-run the whole Ecclesiastical State; with so great a Terror had his arms inspired the Allies. But he had to manage his Subjects as well as his Queen, who considered a war with the head of the Church as a Crime, though there was but too much provocation. He had himself likewise scruples upon that account, which he could not easily surmount. But however, he was willing to try once more, whether the proposed Congress of Mantua would produce some good effect. He hoped at least, that the breaking off the Negotiation, in case it was not successful, would fully justify him. The Congress produced the effect expected by the Allies, that is, it caused the French to lose a great deal of time to no purpose.

portunity to rise in favour of the Bentivoglio's whom he brought with him. The Pope had now done his utmost to persuade the Generals of the Allies to hazard a Battle, without being able to prevail, so much did they dread engaging with the French. Wherefore, knowing how the army stood disposed, and distrusting the Bolanais, who loved him not, he retired to Ravenna, leaving in Bologna the Cardinal of Pavia his prime Minister. He was no sooner gone, but a Tumult arose in the City, during which the Inhabitants called in their old masters the Bentivoglio's, and put them in possession of the Government. The Cardinal of Pavia had taken to flight the moment he perceived their resolution. On the other hand, the army of the Allies advancing to one of the gates of Bologna, and hearing the Bentivoglio's were admitted, and the Legate withdrawn, ran away in confusion, leaving in the Camp their Artillery, Baggage, and Ammunition. Whereupon the Inhabitants falling out, and joining with the Peasants, completely stripped the scattered army, and rendered it entirely unserviceable for several months. The Duke of Ferrara improving this opportunity, very easily recovered the places lately taken from him by the Allies.

Amidst all these mortifications, the Pope still met with another which sensibly touched him. The Cardinal of Pavia was stabbed by the Duke of Urbino, who taxed him with being the cause of the loss of Bologna. The Pope's concern was the greater as he durst not punish, in the person of his Nephew, a Crime he would have thought worthy of the severest treatment, had it been committed by any other hand. His army being dispersed, and his designs upon Ferrara vanished, he quitted Ravenna and retired to Rome. In his way, he had the frequent mortification to see the Papers posted up for the calling of the Council of Pisa, wherein he was himself summoned to appear in person.

It was universally expected that Lewis XII would persevere in his Successes, and certainly in the then situation of Italy, it was his own fault that he was not master of Rome. The Pope had no remedy speedy enough to free himself from his sad condition. The King of Aragon was too remote. The Venetians were unable to lend him a sufficient assistance, and the Emperor was not powerful enough to save him, had he been willing to attempt it. Genoa, Bologna, Florence, Milan, were in the hands of his enemies. But Lewis, either through scruple, or some other motive, instead of pushing his point, ordered Triulzi to retire to Milan with the army, and even disband part of the Troops. Probably, he was willing to deprive the Pope of the pretence of exciting all Christendom against him, and publishing, that he intended to seize Rome and all Italy. He was very justly apprehensive of this from the Pope, since it was in effect the foundation, or rather the pretence of the League formed some months after against France. Triulzi was no sooner at Milan, but Ferdinand's Fleet arrived at Naples, with about three thousand Men, who were soon to be followed by a more considerable Body.

It was not difficult to perceive, that the King of Aragon had sent his Fleet to Naples to support the Pope's Interests, and give jealousy to the King of France. Julius II, who was better informed than any man, revived at the news, and the rather, as he well judged that Ferdinand would not have been altogether assured of the King of England. Since the loss of Bologna, and the rout of his army, he had seemed willing to consent to an agreement with France, and though he had made overtures more like a Conqueror than one conquered, Lewis had accepted them on condition they were approved by the Emperor. But when the Pope found, the Spanish Fleet was at Naples, and Ferdinand began to declare himself, he added new Terms to those he had already proposed, and plainly shewed he was no longer for Peace. This Conduct put Lewis XII beyond all patience. So, despairing to agree with so obstinate an enemy, he ordered Triulzi to send Supplies to Bentivoglio to guard Bologna, and some time after, took Bologna and the Bentivoglio's under his protection. On the other hand, though he was not obliged to assist the Emperor, unless he came into Italy in person, he added however to the German Troops in the State of Florence a strong re-inforcement commanded by la Paliffe. Mean while, the Pope having certain advice of the good Inclination of the Kings of Aragon and England in his favour, resolved to summon a General Council in opposition to that of Pisa. To that end, he published a Bull, wherein, having first excused the neglect the Schismatic Cardinals laid to his charge, and inveighed against their Insolence, he called a Council to be held at the Lateran in Rome, the 19th of April 1512.

Doubtful Behaviour

Emperor.

Since the Bishop of Guercy's Conference with the Pope Maximilian's Conduct was so doubtful, that it was difficult to judge certainly of it. He had agreed to the calling of the Council of Pisa, which was done with his express consent.

1511. consent. But he had not yet appointed Ambassadors, neither was it known that any German Bishop was preparing to go thither. Moreover, he had promised to command in person in Italy, and lead thither a strong reinforcement. But he remained immovable. And yet, he continued at Innsbruck, without shewing any thoughts either of the Council of Pisa, or the War with Italy. Mean while, the Conquests that were expected to be made upon the Venetians were to be all his. Thus, in the present posture of the affairs of Italy, Lewis XII saw the burden of the war laid upon him alone, without his daring almost to complain to the Emperor, for fear he should join with his enemies. And indeed, Maximilian was strongly solicited by the Pope, the King of Aragon, and the Venetians themselves, who offered him a good Sum to induce him to desist from his pretensions to their Dominions. Very probably, he was yet unresolved, and knowing the League that was forming against France, was willing, according to Custom, to let the two Parties proceed, in order to take afterwards that Side which best suited with his Interest. This doubtless was the reason of his preserving a good understanding with Lewis XII, in consenting to the calling of the Council of Pisa, and withal, of reserving a means to be reconciled to the Pope, in sending neither Bishops nor Ambassadors to the Council. Thus remaining almost equally suspected by both Parties, he waited till the Success of the War, or the offers from both Sides, should engage him to declare for one or other.

Mean while, affairs continued still in the same situation. The Pope and the Venetians were alone in open War with France. The Emperor seemed to float between both sides. The King of Aragon had hitherto done nothing more than afforded hopes that he would join the League when concluded. But it was not so yet, every one fearing to engage in it unseasonably. Julius II and Ferdinand knew one another too well to confide in each other. Each strove to make the other subservient to his designs, and was afraid at the same time of being deceived. Ferdinand had still in France an Ambassador, who endeavoured to persuade the King, that the preparations in Spain concerned only the Moor. On the other hand, the Pope had not so quarrelled with Lewis XII, but that he had still left him some hopes, and continued a sort of Negotiation with him, by means of the Bishop of Murray the Scotch Ambassador, who did the office of mediator. Ferdinand was afraid, in case the Pope made a separate Peace with France, the Kingdom of Naples would be in danger. The Pope had no less reason to fear, that to secure the quiet possession of the Kingdom of Naples, Ferdinand would forsake the interests of the Church, and leave him exposed to the mercy of the King of France. In that case, the Pope would have nothing to expect from England. Thus, affairs were come to that pass, that it was necessary, either that each should quickly make a separate Treaty, or both jointly declare themselves, not to remain in this state of uncertainty. And therefore, Ferdinand began at last to pull off the mask a little more, by sending to Naples, the Troops he pretended to design for Africa, in order to hinder the Pope from thinking of a separate agreement with France.

Whilst the Pope and the King of Aragon were thus founding each other, the Cardinals, who had summoned the Council to Pisa and were come to Milan, thought fit to open it by Commissioners. But this was only for form's sake, to keep to the day appointed. Never was General Council so thin. The Bishops of France were not yet arrived, and there was no likelihood of any from Germany. The Pope was enraged when he heard the Council was opened at Pisa. In his passion with the Florentines, for suffering the Council to meet in one of their Towns, he excommunicated them as well as the Pisians, and put both the Cities under an Interdict. But the Florentines forced the Priests to celebrate Divine Service, leaving to private Persons the liberty to observe or reject the Interdict.

It was difficult for Julius II and Ferdinand, to continue long in their present situation, without causing mutual suspicions, capable of changing the face of affairs. The reason which had hitherto withheld Ferdinand, namely, his uncertainty with respect to the King of England, was now vanished. Henry, after long suspense, had at last positively promised to enter into the League against France. Whereupon the Negotiation of the League advanced more in one month than in a whole year before. It was a constant rule with Ferdinand, to cover all his designs with the cloak of Religion, little caring, that after the execution, his artifices were discovered. The Fleet and Army he had prepared in Spain, had for pretence, a War with the Infidels. When he was going to declare openly against France, he failed not to use the pretence of protecting the Church against the outrages of Lewis. As soon as he had gained the King of England, they jointly sent Ambassadors to Lewis, to require him to leave the Pope unmolested, intimating, that as Christian Princes they could not dispense with protecting the Church, disturbed by his ambition. Lewis saw plainly, that their measures being now taken, it would be too late to justify his conduct; and therefore, chose to return a haughty answer, which was precisely what his enemies wanted.

Shortly after, on the 4th of October, the Pope, the King of Aragon, and the Venetians concluded a League at Rome, leaving a place for the King of England, who had shewn his desire to be included. Indeed, Cardinal Bambbridge was concerned in the Negotiation as Ambassador of England. But he was ordered not to sign the Treaty, because Henry expected to make a private one, more agreeable to the interests of England than that which concerned Italy only. By this Treaty the Pope promised to find for the service of the League six hundred Men at Arms, five hundred Light Horse, six thousand Foot (1), and twenty thousand Ducats a month. The Venetians were to furnish eight hundred Men at Arms, a thousand Light Horse, eight thousand Foot, and to pay monthly twenty thousand Ducats. Ferdinand was to provide twelve hundred Men at Arms, a thousand Light Horse, ten thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Ducats a month. It is true, neither the King of France, nor the Duke of Ferrara, were named in the Treaty as enemies of the Allies. But it was easy to perceive it, since the intent of the League was to restore to the Pope the City of Bologna, and whatever belonged to the Holy See, and to make War upon all Persons that should offer to hinder it. A place was left for the Emperor in case he would enter into it; and Raymond of Cardona, Viceroy of Naples, was declared General of the League.

Whilst the World was in expectation of the effect of this League, the Council of Pisa was solemnly opened in that City, by the Cardinals who had convened it, and some Bishops of France and Milan. The first Session was held the 4th of November, though the Pope had excommunicated the Cardinals, and deprived them of their dignity. The second was held the 11th of the same month. But because there was a commotion that day in the City, the Cardinals and Bishops were so terrified, that on the morrow they removed the Council to Milan, where they expected to be more out of danger. Indeed, the Inhabitants of Pisa could not look with a good eye upon a Council, which exposed them to an excommunication and interdict, though it was not in their power to oppose the orders of the Florentines their Sovereigns.

I observed that the Switzers were at variance with Lewis XII, by the practices of the Cardinal of Sion, or rather of the Pope himself, who set him to work. Their first attempt to enter the Milanese proving unsuccessful, they resolved this year to levy sixteen thousand Men, the Cardinal of Sion having positively promised them Money at their entrance into Italy, and that the Army of the Allies would employ the French in la Romagna. As this levy could not be ready till the beginning of the Winter, they began their march in November, and penetrated as far as Varese. Gaston de Foix, Nephew of Lewis XII, Governor of Milan, was so destitute of Troops, that he knew not how to oppose their passage. However, with the few Men he had, he took the Field, to annoy them and obstruct their march. But it was not possible for him to hinder them from coming to the very Gates of Milan. The French had now begun to furnish the Castle with Ammunition in order to quit the City, when suddenly the Switzers hearing no news of the Pope, nor the Army of the Allies which they thought to be assembled in la Romagna, retired to their own Country, after burning some Villages. If the Pope had not disappointed them of the Money he had promised them, and if the Army of the Allies had acted in la Romagna, Milan, Bologna, and Ferrara, would have been in great danger, since the French were at that time very weak in those parts. La Palisse was then in the Emperor's Army with a large detachment of the King's best Troops.

Nothing could be more advantageous to England, than to see the Forces of France turned against Italy. The Conquest of the Duchy of Milan was less beneficial to

of Henry VIII to re-

affairs of Italy.

(1) In the Treaty, as it stands in Rymer, it is only said, that the Pope was to furnish six hundred Men at Arms, without any mention of Light-Horse and Foot. Neither is the number of Troops that was to be lent by the Venetians specified, but it is said, they were to find a Force strong enough to beat the Enemy's. And on the day of the Publication of the League, the Pope and the Venetians were to pay eighty thousand Ducats of Gold for two months wages for these Forces. And. Tom. XIII. p. 307. See Guicciard, l. 10.

1511. Lewis XII than to England. For it procured England a settled Tranquillity, whereas it exposed France to perpetual troubles, and an immense expence. It was therefore policy in Henry to suffer the French, Germans, Italians, and Spaniards to battle it in Italy, without involving himself in a War which could never procure him any advantage. To the time I am speaking of, the Kings of England had taken care not to meddle with the affairs of Italy, if we except Henry III., who being unfortunately delirious of making his second Son King of Sicily, ruined his own Kingdom to execute that extravagant project. But he was not a Prince to be imitated by his Successors. The advantages of this policy were so manifest to all the English, that it required no less than a Ferdinand, the ablest and most subtle Prince of his age, to make them swerve from it.

This Prince had joined with the Pope ever since the beginning of the year 1510, or perhaps the end of the foregoing, and yet had been near two years without declaring himself. This delay proceeded only from his desire to secure England first, that Henry might make a diversion in France, which would oblige Lewis XII to neglect the affairs of Italy. This diversion must have been advantageous to the King of Arragon, since it could remove from Italy, or at least, weaken, a very formidable rival. But it is hard to conceive wherein it could be serviceable to England. On the contrary, there seemed to be several very strong reasons to divert Henry from such a design, without mentioning the Peace he had lately renewed with France, and confirmed by a solemn Oath. This probably was the cause of his so long deferring the conclusion of the League I shall speak of hereafter. Indeed it was not possible, but that some of the King's Council were clear-sighted enough to see that this League was no way advantageous to England, what colour soever was given thereto.

Whilst this Negotiation languished in England, new pretences put Ferdinand upon taking fresh measures, contriving all sorts of ways to succeed with Henry. Lewis XII perished in his design to hold the Council of Pisa, as was said, and that caused Julius II to convene another at the Lateran, and excommunicate by the same Bull all Princes and others who adhered to the first. Among these Princes, was John d'Albret King of Navarre, who being allied to Lewis XII, blindly followed the directions of the Court of France. The King of Navarre had no sooner declared for the Council of Pisa, but Ferdinand upon that pretence, formed the design to seize his whole Kingdom, and make Henry his Son-in-law the instrument to execute it. To that end he gave Henry to understand, that a fair opportunity offered to recover Guienne, taken by France from one of his predecessors, since the League that was going to be concluded in Italy would find Lewis XII too much employment, that probably, he would not be able to defend his own Country. But as the distance of Guienne might deter Henry from attempting this Conquest, Ferdinand, out of affection, very willingly promised to supply him with Troops, Transport-Ships, Artillery, Provisions, Ammunition, without stipulating any thing for himself, but the sole pleasure of procuring his Son-in-law to great an advantage. This offer opened the eyes of Henry and his Council (1).

The acquisition of Guienne seemed to them a thing to advantageous, and withal, so glorious in the beginning of this Reign, that the King, without any farther difficulty, entered into the League proposed by the Pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians. Such was the real motive (2) that induced the Court of England to break the Peace lately renewed with France, without alleging other reason than the protection granted by Lewis to the Bentivoglio's, and the calling of the unlawful assembly of Pisa. As if England was concerned to help the Pope to Bologna, and oppose with Arms a Council, consisting of a score of French Bishops, without power and credit even in the very place where they were assembled. We shall see presently, how Henry was the Dupe of his affectionate Father-in-law, and how Ferdinand politically made use of him to serve his own ends, without giving himself the least trouble about his Son-in-law's affairs.

When Ferdinand had gained Henry, he concluded at Rome, with the Pope and the Venetians, the fore-mentioned League. In this Treaty of Rome, it was expressly said, that all the Articles were negotiated and settled with the King of England's knowledge, the Cardinal of York acting for him, and daily expecting orders to sign it; but that for certain reasons the conclusion of it could be no longer delayed.

About six weeks after, Henry and Ferdinand concluded at London, a private League for the Conquest of Guienne (3). This was a consequence of the first, on the supposition that the depriving the King of France of that Province was a good means to serve and protect the Church of God, the great and principal aim of the Allies. If ever God's holy name was openly and shamefully taken in vain, it is in the preambles of these two Treaties. In the first, the Pope protested that his sole aim in desiring Bologna, and the other States which belonged to the Church, was to restore Italy to her former Tranquillity, that all Christians might join their Forces against the Infidels, as he had ever wished, and still did with all his heart. Thus, to make War upon the Infidels, it was necessary that Italy should be free from troubles, which could not be hoped till the Pope had executed his ambitious projects, without which Italy was not to expect to enjoy any quiet.

In the second Treaty, Henry and Ferdinand set forth, That they had made Alliances with all Christian Princes, solely to be enabled to wage War with the enemies of Christ; and for that purpose, were now employed in preparing powerful Armies by Land and Sea; but that suddenly, when they least expected it, they were told, the King of France's Troops were besieging Bologna, where the Pope, old and infirm, lay seized with a grievous distemper, and attended by all his Cardinals: That being extremely afflicted at this news, they had besought the King of France by Letters and Ambassadors, to give over his design: That the Pope had offered him the pardon of all his Sins, provided only he would abstain from the patrimony of the Church, cease to inflame the Schism, and adhere to the Council of Lateran: But that all this had been to no purpose. On the contrary, he had made himself master of Bologna, by the treachery of some of the Inhabitants; twice routed the Army of the Holy Church of Rome, and in contempt of the Holy See, called a Council, after having bribed some of the Cardinals. That since, the Pope had sent a Legate to him to demand only that he would forbear to attack the Church. That the Legate not prevailing, the two Kings of England and Spain had sent Ambassadors to advise him amicably to desist from his attempts, and be reconciled with the Pope, or else they could do no less than undertake the protection of the Church; but that their advice had been slighted. That upon all these considerations, the two Kings perfectly knowing how detrimental such an ambition might prove to the Catholic Faith, the Church of God, and the welfare of Christendom, had thought proper to agree upon the following Articles, to the praise and glory of Almighty God, our Lord Jesus Christ, and the whole triumphant Court of Heaven, for the defence, exaltation, increase of the Catholic Faith, the Christian Religion, the Holy Roman Church, which was unjustly oppressed, and upon the frequent instances, exhortations, and admonitions of the Pope, the head thereof. The substance of this pious Treaty was as follows:

I. The two Kings took upon them the defence and protection of the Holy Roman Church, against all Persons that should attack her (4).

II. Ferdinand, as Catholic King, and to discharge his duty to God and the Church, promised to take Arms in her defence in Italy.

In the III^d Article it was said, that the Pope and the sacred College of Cardinals had judged, that in order to deliver the Church from the oppression he groaned under, it was necessary to wage War upon the King of France, not only in Italy, but in such of his Provinces also as bordered upon the two Allies. And therefore it was agreed, that they should carry their Arms into Guienne, and conquer that Province for the Crown of England, and that Henry, in assisting the Church, might at the same time recover what belonged to him. To that purpose, as soon as Ferdinand should have actually declared against the Kingdom of France, and taken Arms in defence of the Church, Henry, at a proper season, should proclaim war against the same Prince in defence of the same Church.

(1) The Lord Herbert says, some of the Council who more seriously weighed the Business, were against a War with France, and more particularly for a Religion which England had never enjoyed. Let us therefore (says one of the Council) leave off our attempts against the Terra firma. For the natural Situation of England, and our little Commerce with Spain is that kind. England alone is a just Empire: Or when we would enlarge our colonies, let us go that way we can, and so we shall be from the eternal Providence, hard distressed us; and that is by Sea. Herbert, p. 8.

(2) Another Inducement to Henry was the Pope's Promise to take away the Title of Most Christian from the King of France, and confer it on him.

To perform this Article, Henry promised to send into Guienne some time in April 1512, a body of six thousand Foot (1) commanded by a good General; to maintain them at his own expence, and not recall them without the consent of the King of Aragon. Ferdinand bound himself, on his part, to find five hundred Men at Arms, fifteen hundred Light-Horse, and four thousand Foot, on the same terms. Moreover, he engaged to furnish the English Troops with provisions and ammunition at a moderate price. It was farther agreed, that each of the two Kings should send a Fleet to Sea with three thousand good Soldiers, for six months, besides the Mariners, and that neither should recall his Fleet without the other's consent.

IV. That Ferdinand should find forty Ships, at a reasonable rate, to transport the English Forces.

V. That in case the Allies should take any places in Guienne and elsewhere, they should be delivered to him of the two Kings, who had a prior title to the same.

VI. That if either of the two Kings should be attacked out of Guienne, they should jointly take care of the defence of the Country of him who wanted assistance, sincerely and with all their power.

VII. That the two Kings considering that the Pope had called at Rome a Council, which all Christian Princes ought to obey, and send Ambassadors to, and it was affirmed that the King of France persisted in his design to continue the Council summoned to Pisa, they agreed to adhere to whatever should be decreed by the Council of Lateran, and oppose that of Pisa, with all its Favors and Adherents.

VIII. That neither of the two Kings should make Peace or Truce without a mutual consent.

IX. That by this, the former Treaties should not be deemed void, but, on the contrary, remain in full force.

X. That it should be ratified within four months, by Henry, and Ferdinand, in his own and the name of Queen Jane his Daughter.

Inpretation of Henry and his Council.

Henry and his Council thought, without doubt, they had made a very advantageous Treaty, since it was to procure them the Duchy of Guienne, and Ferdinand demanded nothing for himself, as if he had acted purely from a motive of Religion, and out of affection to his Son-in-law, though, in reality, he had consulted only his own interest. As for the Pope's affairs, about which both Kings seemed to be so greatly concerned, it may be affirmed, they did not so much as think of them, as it afterwards appeared. But they wanted that pretence to dazzle the publick, though, in all appearance, the world was not so blind, as to imagine that two great Kings should take arms on purpose to dissolve a Council which called itself General, composed of a small number of Bishops, of one Nation only, and so little regarded, that even at Milan, where it was removed, the Government was forced to make use of their whole Authority to procure its reception.

During these Transactions, the Emperor gave the King of France so much cause to suspect his Sincerity, that necessity only obliged him to feign any further confidence in him. There was no German Bishop come to the Council; and when the Emperor was pressed upon that subject, he replied, It was necessary first to have the approbation of the Diet of the Empire, which he did not doubt of obtaining: That though he should send Bishops from his hereditary Dominions to Pisa, it would be more prejudicial than advantageous to the Council, since it would give occasion to imagine, he depaired to obtain the Diet's consent. On the other hand, instead of commanding in person his Army in the state of Venice, as he had promised, he left all to the French Troops, who were come to his aid. In short, whilst he listened to the offers of the Pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians, he told the French Ambassador, he was ready to march to Rome at the head of an Army, provided his master would send him a strong Re-inforcement, and a sum of Money, proportionable to the greatness of the Undertaking. Amidst these uncertainties, Lewis knew not what to trust to.

He could look upon Maximilian but as an ally ready to abandon him, if he found it more for his interest to join with his enemies. In that case, all the Emperor's conquests upon the Venetians would be so many losses to France. Mean while, the Supplies he lent him were very expensive, and yet, he durst not afford him a pretence to change sides. Thus Lewis saw himself upon the point of being attacked by all the forces of the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Venetians, without any hope of assistance from the Emperor. As for England, though he was yet ignorant of the Treaty of London, and Henry's Ambassador positively denied that his Master intended to be concerned, all Henry's Proceedings were plain indications that he would soon declare against him.

Mean while, the Pope, who had ever in view the taking of Bologna and Ferrara, was very pressing with the Viceroy of Naples to advance with his Troops, and take the command of the confederate Army. But notwithstanding all his solicitations, the Junction could not be till the middle of December, and even then, the Naples Artillery not being yet arrived, the Army could be only employed in some trifling Expeditions in la Romagna, with which ended the year 1511. It is time now to return to the affairs of England.

Though Henry had not yet proclaimed war with France, Lewis XII knew what he was to expect. He had good intelligence by means of one Buonifazio a Merchant of Lucca, who being a Bankrupt, was retired into England, where he had obtained so much favour from the Pope as to be made a kind of Agent (2). This Man being corrupted by France, discovered to Lewis the secrets, the Pope was sometimes forced to trust him with; and hence it was that the Court of France was informed of many things which the English would have concealed from them. It was probably by this means that the King of France had the first notice of the League concluded at London, though it was made a great Secret. But shortly after, he had no more occasion for spies to know Henry's Intentions.

The Parliament being met the fourth of February (3), the King communicated his design of making War upon France. He protested, his sole aim was to free the Pope from the King of France's oppression, and especially to cause the Schismatical Council of Pisa, now removed to Milan, to be dissolved. Though this War undertaken as the King himself affirmed, solely to oblige the Pope, was little agreeable to the interest of England, the Parliament however gave the King a large Subsidy (4). In all appearance, the leading Members of the House of Commons being informed of the true reasons, so ordered it, that the rest came into their opinion. Otherwise, it would have been difficult to make them perceive the necessity of England's engaging in a War with France, to restore Bologna to the Pope, and dissolve a Council to be inconsiderable as that of Pisa. Before the Parliament broke up, the King was pleased to refore John Dudley, Son of Edmund Dudley, to the rank and honours his Family had been deprived of by the Father's Attainder. From that time, he had always an affection for him, and at length, towards the end of his Reign, made him Lord Admiral of England.

The War Henry intended to undertake against France, having for pretence the dissolving of the Council of Pisa, he could not dispense with acknowledging that of Lateran, and sending thither Ambassadors. He made choice of Silvester Bishop of Worcester, with Sir Robert Wingfield, and commissioned them to agree in his name to whatever should be deemed necessary for the reformation of the Church, as well in the Head as in the Members. This Clause was only to cast a mist before People's eyes, since nothing certainly was farther from the Pope's thoughts, than to endeavour in this Council, either his own or the Church's reformation.

1512. in the Guienne expedition, being embarked about the end of May (1), in Spanish Vessels, arrived the 8th of June at Pajosa, in the Province of Guipuscoa, where the Marquis of Dorset landed those he was to command. The Lord Herbert says, these Troops consisted of ten thousand Men, but probably, he included in that number the three thousand that were to serve at Sea according to the Treaty (2).

The Admiral having conveyed the Marquis of Dorset to Spain, put to Sea again, and arriving on the Coast of Britagne, landed some Troops, and plundered the Country (3). Henry hearing, the King of France was preparing a great naval Armament, sent a reinforcement (4) to his Admiral, which enabled him to make head against the French. The two Fleets meeting the 10th of August, came to a furious engagement, which ended in great loss on both sides. The Regent, a first rate Ship (5), and the Cordeliere, commanded by Primauguet (6), being grappled, were both blown up, with loss of all their Men. This accident happened by the desperate courage of Primauguet, who finding he could not save his Ship, set fire to the powder (7).

The Treaty of League concluded at London, seemed to be made only to pave the way for Henry to the Conquest of Guienne. But Ferdinand had never any such thought. His sole aim was to conquer Navarre for himself, and employ to that end the English Troops he had sent for into Spain. But as it was by no means proper to inform Henry of such a project, he had been obliged to allure him with the hopes of recovering Guienne, in order to induce him to send his Troops. This is the true reason why Ferdinand shewed in the Treaty so much disinterestedness, that all the advantage seemed to be on the side of England. But the performance was very far from answering the engagement.

The Marquis of Dorset being arrived in Guipuscoa, found a Commissioner of the King, who paid him great respect, and told him, the Duke d'Alva was taking the Field, in order to join him. And indeed, the Duke immediately put himself at the head of the Spanish Army. But instead of joining the English who were encamped near Fontarabia with design to besiege with him the City of Bayonne, as was resolved, he kept at Lagrange on the borders of Navarre. He intimated to the English General, that the King of Navarre being in Alliance with France, it would be very dangerous to attack Bayonne with Navarre behind them: That whilst they should be employed in the Siege, the King of Navarre might introduce the French into his Dominions, join with them, and by encamping between the Mountains of Navarre and the Sea, cut off the Provisions which should be brought to the Camp before Bayonne, without being obliged to give Battle, if he thought proper: That therefore it was necessary, before they engaged in the Siege, to try to gain the King of Navarre to the Interests of their masters.

These reasons were so plausible, that the Marquis of Dorset was easily persuaded to send an English Officer to the King of Navarre, to require him to join with the Allies. Ferdinand summoned him likewise, but more haughtily, to forsake the King of France, and come into the League (8). The King of Navarre replied, he was resolved to stand neutral. But the English and Spaniards not being satisfied with this answer, jointly pressed him to declare himself, or deliver four of his Towns for their Security, which that Prince would not grant. During these Negotiations, a French Army commanded by the Duke of Longueville, approached the Frontiers of Bearn. Whereupon the Marquis of Dorset complained to Ferdinand, that the time lost in soliciting the King of Navarre, had served only to give the French opportunity to come and defend their Borders, and withal pressed him to declare, whether he would attack Guienne, pursuant to the Treaty of London. Ferdinand answered, Prudence would not suffer him to send his army to Fontarabia to besiege Bayonne, and leave his Dominions exposed to the Invasions of the French and Navarrois: That it was much more convenient to pass through Navarre, and secure three or four places, in order to hinder his enemies from making use of that Kingdom against him: That therefore he wished the English would join the Duke of Alva, and his army should make the Vanguard, to be exposed to the first dangers: That however the Siege of Bayonne would not be retarded, because there was no question, the King of Navarre would be glad to be something pressed, in order to justify himself to the King of France, when he should enter into the League. The Marquis of Dorset, who did not yet see into his designs, having held a Council of War, replied, That by his Instructions he could undertake nothing against the King of Navarre; but if the Duke of Alva would pass thro' that Kingdom, he might if he pleased; but for his part, being already near Bayonne, he could not think of taking so great a compass to join him.

Ferdinand was not content with this answer. He strongly insisted upon what he had proposed, that the English Troops should come and join his army, and in the mean while, gave orders to the Duke of Alva to besiege Pampeluna, Metropolis of Navarre. During the Siege, he continually amused the Marquis of Dorset with positive promises, that immediately after the taking of Pampeluna, the Duke of Alva should join him to besiege Bayonne. Mean while, the King of Navarre being unable to defend himself, was retired into France, where he made a Treaty with Lewis XII, for their common defence. But it cost him the Town of Salvatierra, and all Bearn, which he was forced to deliver to the French.

Pampeluna having surrendered by capitulation the 25th of July, Ferdinand, according to his promise, should have ordered the Duke of Alva to join the English. But the rest of the fortified Towns in Navarre served him for pretence to delay the Junction. So the Duke of Alva continued his Conquests, whilst the English Troops, tho' without stirring from their Camp, served as a countenance to his designs. And indeed, though the French, who daily received fresh Supplies, saw themselves sufficiently strong to withstand the Duke of Alva, they never dared to enter Navarre, for fear of coming between the English and Spaniards. Wherefore, being contented to remain encamped between Bayonne and Salvatierra, they gave the Duke of Alva all the leisure he wanted to subdue almost all Navarre.

Then it was that the Marquis of Dorset plainly perceived the King of Aragon acted with insincerity, and that his design from the very first was not to invade Guienne, but conquer Navarre. Ferdinand was very sensible, his Artifice would at last be discovered. So, to prevent the complaints the English General might make to the King his master, he sends an Express to England, to give Henry an account, after his manner, of the affairs of that Country, and to desire him to order his General to act in concert with him. Henry, who had received nothing to the contrary from the Marquis, readily sent Windfor Herald with the desired orders to the General.

Whilst the Herald was on his journey, the Duke of Alva became master of St. Juan de Pie del Puerto. Presently after the taking of that place, Ferdinand acquainted the Marquis of Dorset, that his army was ready to march into Guienne, and desired him to join the Duke of Alva without delay. But the Marquis was no longer willing to be deceived. He knew, the French army was intrenched between Bayonne and Salvatierra, with the River Bidasoa in front, which must be passed within view, and besides Bayonne was so well provided, that there was no likelihood of besieging it. What Ferdinand therefore proposed was impracticable, and only a continuation of his Artifices. From St. Juan de Pie del Puerto, the right-hand Road led into Bearn, and the left to Bayonne, so the Duke of Alva's intent was to engage the English to enter Bearn with him, under colour there was no other way to draw the enemies from their advantageous Post, or at least, to besiege Salvatierra. But the English General having no orders to make War upon the King of Navarre, either in Bearn or elsewhere, refused to join the Spaniards. Ferdinand reaped this advantage from his refusal, that he cast the whole blame upon him, of their not invading Guienne according to the Treaty. After that, the Duke of Alva turning back, laid Siege to Estella, the only place that remained to the King of Navarre.

The Marquis of Dorset, full of Indignation at these proceedings, and considering that his army was daily weakened by Sickness and want of Provisions, which were grown scarce since the war in Navarre, desired Ferdinand Mean while, he was not sorry for it, since the English were almost become useless, after the Conquest of Navarre. In the mean while, the Marquis of Dorset falling sick, the Lord Thomas Howard took the Command of the army. At the same time, as the Troops were going to embark, the Herald arrived from England, with positive orders to the General, to obey the Commands of King Ferdinand (1). But the army mutinying it was impossible to detain the Soldiers any longer in Spain, and the Embarkation being made, they arrived in England in November (2). Henry was at first very angry with his General; but being informed of all particulars during the Campaign, plainly saw, Ferdinand had deceived him, and that his affected disinterestedness in the Treaty of League, was only to draw him more easily into the Snare. He thought proper however to dissemble, for fear of giving Ferdinand a pretence to join with France, and leave him in straits.*

Before the year was expired, Ferdinand saw himself in full possession of Navarre, though the King of France had used some endeavours to wrest that Conquest out of his hands. In December, the King of Navarre, and Francis Duke of Angoulême besieged Pampeluna; but not being able to take the place, were forced to abandon the rest of the Kingdom to the Spaniards. After Ferdinand was in possession of Navarre, he fought pretences to keep it, but found no better than a Bull of Pope Julius II, who excommunicated John d'Albret King of Navarre, and gave his Kingdom in prey to the Conqueror. Mezerai affirms, this Bull never appeared; but the Lord Herbert says, it was dated March 1. 1512.

We must now see what passed in Italy whilst Ferdinand was conquering Navarre. The confederate army of the Pope, the King of Aragon, and the Venetians, under the command of the Viceroy of Naples, taking the Field in December, the Pope caused the Viceroy to be continually pressed by Cardinal John de Medici, his Legate, to besiege Bologna. At length, notwithstanding the opposition of the Viceroy, and the Venetian General, who foresaw great difficulties in the execution of that design, the Pope's Intimates were to be complied with, and the Siege of Bologna being resolved, the army of the Allies (3) appeared before the City. But Gaston de Foix Duke of Nemours, and Governor of Milan, coming to its relief, compelled the Allies to raise the Siege. Some days after, he defeated a Venetian Army at Brescia, and slew eight thousand Men. At last, on the 11th of April, finding means to give the Allies battle near Ravenna, he put them to rout, and took the Legate prisoner; but was himself slain after the Battle, in too warmly pursuing a body of Spaniards, who were retreating in good order. After that Prince's death, the La Palisse took the Command of the army, and the next day became master of Ravenna. Whereupon all the Towns of la Romagna, taken by the Pope after the Battle of Agnadell, voluntarily surrendered to the Cardinal of St. Severin, who was in the French Army as Legate of the Council of Pisa, transferred to Milan.

The Consecration at Rome was so great, that the Cardinals went in a Body to petition the Pope to make Peace with France. But Julius II had resources unknown perhaps to the Cardinals. So, all they could obtain was to engage him to make some feigned advances, in order to gain time, and hinder the French from marching to Rome, as they might easily have done, without fear of meeting any obstacle.

Whilst Lewis's affairs seemed to be in the most flourishing condition, they were in reality going to decay. The Swiss, encouraged by the Cardinal of Sion, preparing to exert their utmost to invade the Duchy of Milan, the La Palisse thought it more proper for his Master's Interest, to relieve that Country which was destitute of Troops, than make Conquests in the Ecclesiastical State. So, leaving the Cardinal of St. Severin in la Romagna, with five or six thousand Men, he hastily marched into Milan. The retreat of the French, when it lay in their power to march to Rome, inspired Julius II with fresh Courage. From thenceforward he would no more hear of Peace, though Lewis XII offered him the same Terms as before his Victory. At this juncture it was that the Council of Lateran was opened the 3d of May, which had been delayed by reason of the battle of Ravenna.

All hope of Peace vanishing, the Pope excommunicated Lewis XII, and put France under an Interdict (4). He used for pretence the captivity of his Legate, who was detained at Milan, where, tho' a prisoner, he performed however the Functions of the Pope's Legate, the Inhabitants of Milan refusing to own the Authority of the Council held in their City. It was a great mortification to Lewis, to see his Council contemned by his own Subjects; but this was only a small part of the misfortunes to which he was exposed this same year. After la Palisse had quitted la Romagna, all the Towns of that Country submitted to the Pope. At the same time, Ferdinand became master of Navarre, and Lewis was forced to send an army into Bearn to hinder the English and Spaniards from invading Guienne. On the other hand, the Emperor concluded a Truce with Venice, and secretly promised to withdraw from the French Army a body of German Troops, lent the King for the defence of the Milanese. And yet upon the assurance of this aid it was that Lewis recalled from Milan part of his own Troops, not doubting that with those he left there, and the Germans sent him by the Emperor, he should be able to resist his Enemies. Thus, the French finding themselves weak in the Duchy of Milan, la Palisse was obliged to recall the Cardinal of St. Severin, with his Troops, which was the cause of the loss of la Romagna.

Mean while, the Swiss, to the number of sixteen thousand, began their march about the end of August, or the beginning of September. But instead of taking the direct road to the Milanese, the passes whereof, they did not question, were strongly guarded, they marched to Trent, with Maximilian's permission. Though this, if any, was an Enemy's act, he was still desirous to hide his Intentions, by telling the French Ambassador, that his Alliance with the Swissers suffered him not to refuse them a passage through his Dominions; as if his Treaty with Lewis XII was to be less observed. The Swissers, having passed unobserved through Trent, proceeded to Verona, and joining the Venetians, they marched together towards Milan. Whereupon the French entirely disconcerted, and not having above ten thousand Men, resolved to retire into the fortified Towns, in order to waste the Enemy's Army by Sieges, till the King sent them Supplies, or the approaching Winter stopped the progress of the Allies. But they were soon deprived of this refuge, by the Emperor's orders for his Troops to retire immediately. These orders being punctually obeyed, la Palisse found himself so weak, that despairing to save the Milanese, he resolved to repair the Mountains, and return into France. The Prelates of the Council seeing Milan was going to be abandoned, by a sudden Decree, removed the Council to Lyons, and followed the French Troops. They would have carried the Cardinal de Medici with them; but went away in such confusion, that his Friends found means to secure him. After the French were retired, all the Towns of the Duchy readily surrendered to the Swissers and Venetians, except Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, which submitted to the Pope. On the other hand, Alexander Bentivoglio, not thinking himself safe in Bologna, departed from thence with all his family, leaving the City to the Pope's Mercy. Thus Julius II, who, about a month before, saw himself in a very ill situation, was arrived at the height of his wishes by this surprising revolution, which restored him Ravenna, Bologna, all la Romagna, and drove the French out of Italy.

There remained still four things to do to complete the Pope's happiness, namely, to dispossess the Duke of Ferrara, to restore the Sforza's to Milan, and the Medici to Florence; and lastly, to expel the Germans and Spaniards out of Italy. As for the Duke of Ferrara, he voluntarily delivered himself to the Pope, upon the faith of a Safe-Conduct. An Imprudence which would have cost him dear, had he not been freed by Fabricius Colonna his Friend, who forced the Guard set at the gates of Rome, to hinder his departure.

The French were no sooner out of Italy, than the Allies began to discover their different ends in acting against France. Upon this occasion they judged proper to meet at Mantua, where they could agree but upon two Articles, namely, that Maximilian Sforza eldest Son of Lodovico the Moor, should be restored to Milan, and the House of de Medici to Florence. In consequence of this last resolution, the army of the Allies approaching Florence, compelled the Florentines to consent to a Treaty, whereby the Medici were restored to their Country as Citizens only, and not as Governors. But the Cardinal de Medici entering the City by virtue of the Treaty, whilst the army of the Allies was at the gates, found means to introduce many Officers and Soldiers, and raise

A session which made him master of the City. Whereupon, the Government was settled upon the same foot, it was before the banishment of the Medici.

It was a great step for the Pope to have restored the Medici to Florence, and Sforza to Milan. But this did not suffice to content him. The Duke of Ferrara was still master of his Duchy, and the Council of Pisa sitting at Lyons. The Allies therefore must be brought to turn their arms against Ferrara, and procure a Peace between the Emperor and the Venetians, that the Emperor might without difficulty abandon his Council. To that purpose, the Pope obtained a second meeting at Rome, where he could gain nothing with respect to Ferrara, because the Duke was protected by the King of Aragon. Besides, the Venetians could not agree to find Men and Money to render the Pope master of that Duchy. As for the Peace between the Emperor and Venice, he found still greater difficulties, though he passionately wished to accomplish that Project, for fear one or other of the two Powers should recall the French into Italy. But the intolerable Terms proposed by the Emperor to the Venetians, hindered him from succeeding. In short, the Pope seeing his labour was in vain, and desiring, at any rate, to dissolve the Council of Pisa, and prevent the return of the French into Italy, concluded with the Emperor a League offensive and defensive against Venice. By this Treaty, the Emperor engaged to become a principal Party in the League of Rome, and agreed, that the Pope should keep Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, saving however the Rights of the Empire. He promised to renounce the Council of Pisa, and forsake the Duke of Ferrara, and the Bentivoglio's. The Pope engaged on his part, to aid the Emperor with all his power, thunder his Censures against the Venetians, declare them excluded out of the League of Rome, and drop the prosecution of the Colonnas, for aiding the Duke of Ferrara to make his escape. The Treaty being signed and ratified, the Bishop of Gurck as the Emperor's Lieutenant, renounced in the next Session of the Council of Lateran, the Assembly of Pisa, and revoked whatever had been done by the Emperor towards the calling and supporting it.

About the end of December, Maximilian Sforza, eldest Son of Lodovico the Moor was put in possession of the Duchy of Milan, pursuant to the agreement of the Allies at Mantua.

I have now run over the occurrences of the year 1512, a year very remarkable for the several changes in the affairs of Italy, and still more, for the conduct of the Princes concerned, which discovers their different characters. Lewis XII was the dupe of his scruples, which made him lose the opportunity of disabling the Pope to hurt him, and in the end occasioned the loss of the Milanese. Julius II made Religion subservient to his immoderate ambition, by using the glory of God and the good of the Church, for a cloak to gratify his passions. Having formed a League to restore the Venetians to their Dominions, to the glory of God and exaltation of the Christian Faith, he concluded another, on the same pretence, to dispossess them of all they had recovered. Ferdinand drew Henry VIII into a War for the Pope's defence, and to procure Guienne for the Crown of England; but artfully made it subservient to the Conquest of Navarre for himself. The Emperor Maximilian acted with no more fincely. His conduct was the more extraordinary, as he was solely indebted to Lewis XII for all he had conquered in Italy, after the League of Cambray. Nay, the very preservation of his Conquests was wholly owing to that Prince's continual supplies. And yet, he no sooner saw him upon the decline, but he most ungratefully helped to hurl him down the precipice. It is said he had a Book wherein he marked in red Letters, the injuries received from the King of France. But I do not know in what colour Lewis XII should have writ in his Book the wrong done him by Maximilian on this occasion. As for Henry VIII, he was certainly the dupe of the King of Aragon and the Pope. But what is more strange, after Ferdinand and Pope, by their artifices, had engaged that Prince in a League against France, as soon as affairs had taken such a turn that they no longer wanted his assistance, they thought of no more of him than if there had been no such Person in the World. In all the Negotiations between the Allies, whether at Mantua or Rome, after the retreat of the French, Cardinal Bambridge was never called to them, neither was there any mention of the King of England. The Pope and the King of Aragon, satisfied with expelling the French, forsook Henry, without troubling themselves about his concerns. It even appears that he was not informed of these Negotiations. We see in the Collection of the Public Acts, that the 10th of November, he still gave full powers to his Ambassadors (1) at several Courts, to treat of a League in favour of the Pope, at the very time, the Pope was entirely neglecting the interests of England. About the same time, Henry signed Letters Patents, declaring he entered into the League concluded at Rome a year before, though, since that, Julius II was in possession of Ravenna, all la Romagna, Parma, Placentia, Reggio, and his desires had been accomplished by Lewis's loss of Genoa and Milan, and by the Emperor's renouncing the Assembly of Pisa. Thus, he was evidently the dupe of all these intrigues. He lent, without knowing it, his Troops to Ferdinand to conquer Navarre. On the other hand, the Terror of his Arms was greatly subservient to the Pope's designs, as it hindered Lewis XII from keeping in Italy Troops, which he believed necessary for the defence of his Kingdom against the English. This was the real aim of Julius and Ferdinand, and Henry was so blind as to engage, without necessity, in a War with France for their interest, imagining he was acting for his own.

Who would not have thought that Henry's experience should have rendered him wiser and more circumspect? And yet, he was farther amused by these very Princes, who told him that having nothing more to fear in Italy, they were going to join all their Forces to invade France, and if he would act likewise, he might easily recover Guienne and Normandy. Henry being periwaded of their sincerity, immediately sent Ambassadors to Brussels (2), to conclude a League against France with the Pope, the Emperor, the King of Aragon, Charles of Austria Sovereign of the Low-Countries, and Margaret Duchess Dowager of Savoy his Aunt, who governed his Dominions during his Minority. Henry reckoned that the execution of the Treaty would immediately follow the conclusion. But it will hereafter be seen, that if they concluded the League, it was only to draw Money from him, and leave him to make War all alone. He was young and unexperienced, but withal so self-conceited as to think himself wiser than his Council. Besides, he had plenty of ready Money in his Coffers. What could Persons so subtle as Julius, Maximilian, and Ferdinand, desire better than to have to deal with such a Prince as Henry? We have already seen this year 1512, how artfully they improved so favorable a disposition, and we shall see in the following years, how very little he himself profited by what he might have learnt by experience, during the course of the present. However this be, being resolved to carry War into France, he assembled a Parliament the 4th of November, to demand an aid of Money. Shortly after, the Commons, without examining too closely the reasons which induced him to take arms, granted him a Subsidy (3), and a Poll-Tax (4) upon all his Subjects, for the expenses of the War (5).

During the Session of the Parliament, Henry received a Bull from the Pope, who to encourage him to push the War vigorously against France, granted a plenary indulgence to all his Subjects that should aid him with their Person or purse. This was all the assistance he had from the Pope for a War, the sole motive whereof, as it was pretended, was the defence of the Church.

Nothing more remains to finish the account of the occurrences of this year, but briefly to mention the measures taken by Henry with regard to Scotland.

Whilst Henry resolved to carry War into France, he used his utmost endeavours to preserve a good understanding with the King of Scotland. But it was almost impossible that England should be in War with France, and Scotland not interpose. However, Henry imagined that by the assurances he gave the King of Scotland, of his intention to observe punctually the Treaty of Peace, he should prevent him from being concerned in the quarrel. James suffered him to think what he pleased, and in the mean time was preparing to assist France by a powerful diversion, in case that Kingdom was attacked. Upon the first report that the King of England was going to quarrel with Lewis XII, James took care to be provided with pretences to break with him. The affair of Breton furnished him with one, and he moreover fought others. But the true reason of his acting was, that, for some ages past, the Kings of England were grown so powerful, and had shewn so great a desire to unite all Great-Britain under their Dominion, that the Scots could little expect to resist them but by the assistance of France, which had ever protected them. It was therefore more necessary than just, for Scotland to continue firm to the interests of France, and not suffer that Crown to be disabled to assist her Allies. So, not to swerve from this maxim, James IV, who had determined to go to Jerusalem, laid aside his design when he heard there was like to be a rupture between France and England. He equipped a Fleet, which he intended to send into France, under colour of presenting it to Queen Ann, Wife of Lewis XII. But this Fleet, in which was the largest Ship that had yet been seen on the Sea, was lost or disabled by a storm and the Admiral's ill conduct.

1513. Peace and Interests of the Princes. Of Julius II.

Of Ferdinand.

Of the Venetians.

At last, Henry having proclaimed War with Lewis XII, James concluded a League with France the 22d of May this year. Shortly after, he prepared an Army, but without divulging for what it was designed. His intent was to make an inroad into England, as soon as Henry had sent his Forces into France. Henry having notice of this armament, sent two Ambassadors (1) into Scotland, under colour of adjusting some little differences, but in reality to found the King's intentions. The Ambassadors acquainting King James that their master was something jealous of this Armament, as if it was made in favour of France, James replied, That being equally an Ally of both Crowns, his design was to observe an exact neutrality. The Ambassadors prayed him to give that answer in writing; but he refused, on pretence it would breed a suspicion in the King of France. Shortly after, Henry learnt by his Spies that a League was concluded between France and Scotland, and he even procured a copy of the Treaty (2). So, perceiving that a War with Scotland was unavoidable, he sent the Earl of Surrey into the northern parts with power to levy an Army, and act against Scotland in case of necessity (3).

The occurrences of the year 1512 made great alterations in the interests of the Princes concerned, and consequently in their designs and measures.

Julius II, pleased with having expelled the French out of Italy, and so greatly increased his power, by the acquisition of so many places, was thinking however of seizing Ferrara. After that, he hoped, with the assistance of the Venetians and Florentines to be able to drive the Emperor out of Venice, though he had lately league'd with him. As for the rest, he had no thought of making Conquests in France; his sole aim was to find Lewis XII employment at home, and entirely dissolve the remains of the Council of Pisa, which however was not very formidable to him, since the Emperor's disengagement.

The King of Arragon's sole view was to preserve his late Conquest of Navarre. To enjoy it in peace, the only way was to keep Lewis XII elsewhere employed, or prevail with him not to disturb him. To that purpose it was necessary to use the terror of the Arms of the Allies, and particularly of the King of England, that the King of France being attacked from several quarters, might be induced of himself to desire a Peace, and leave him in possession of Navarre. Ferdinand would not have scrupled to abandon his Allies, provided he could obtain at that rate such a Peace as he wanted.

The Emperor fought only to draw Money both from his Friends and Enemies. He was very sensible, that with his own Forces alone, it would be difficult to make Conquests upon the Venetians; and that the Pope, though his Ally, did not wish it. But he was extremely reserved to them, to procure the larger sums in making a Peace. On the other hand, he endeavoured to embroil matters as much as possible, and make new Leagues, because in all the Treaties of that kind, Money was still given him to maintain imaginary Troops, which he never raised, at least not so many as he promised.

The Venetians were extremely desirous to end a destructive War, by which they were drained. Their sole aim was to induce the Emperor to be satisfied with a good sum of Money, for the restitution of their Towns, and thereby put their State upon the same foot it was before the League of Cambray. But as the Emperor could not think of depriving himself of an entrance into

Italy by the restitution of these places, it was their business to compel him in some measure, by new Leagues which might make him apprehensive of losing them without any advantage. But as this was the Senate's sole view, they were always ready to break all their engagements, as soon as the Emperor would hearken to reason.

The Swissers thought only of supporting Sforza at Of the Milan, to have always in that Duchy a Prince who should rely on their assistance. Consequently, it was their interest to keep the King of France at a distance, and oppose all his attempts to recover it.

Lewis XII, extremely mortified at the good success of the King of his Enemies in Italy, ardently desired to recover Gemo of France. Milan. To succeed, the aid of the Venetians, the Emperor, or the Swissers was necessary. It was also requisite to hasten the conclusion with one or other of the two last Powers, that the expedition of the Milanese might be made in the Spring, for fear it should be prevented by the War, the King of England was preparing against him in Picardy.

Of all Lewis's Enemies Henry was the only one who thought of making Conquests in France, preposterously imagining, his Allies would make diversions in several places, to facilitate the execution of his designs. But he did not yet sufficiently know them. The Venetians had been excluded out of the late league. The Pope and King of Arragon had no desire to attack France, but only to create Lewis troubles, which might hinder him from thinking of Italy. It was solely with this view that they feigned a willingness to second the King of England. As for Maximilian, Henry and his Council must have voluntarily deceived themselves, to hope for any assistance from him.

James IV King of Scotland, seeing France upon the point of being attacked by the King of England, was preparing to assist her, deeming his own and that Kingdom's interests to be inseparable. He easily perceived, Henry courted him only to hinder his interposing in the quarrel, and was willing to feed him with hopes of succeeding in his design. But he was however determined to break the Peace, rather than leave a Kingdom in danger, from which alone he could expect a speedy and powerful protection in case of need. It is true, he had made a Peace with Henry VII, and renewed it with Henry VIII. But it was when these Princes had no quarrel with France, his ancient and constant Ally. In his opinion, Henry by wantonly attacking France on frivolous pretences, violated indirectly the Peace made with Scotland. At least, James pretended that in signing a Peace with England, he was not bound to forsake France whenever the King of England should think of attacking her.

Such were the dispositions of all these Potentates in the beginning of the year 1513. We must see now by what means each endeavoured to attain his ends. This new Scene will discover to us no less variety, artful managements, devices and artifices, than the former, since the Actors and Personages will still be the same.

Whilst Henry was seriously preparing for the War he was to carry into France, his pretended Allies were minding their own affairs, without regarding his interests. Since he had entered into the League of Rome, the Allies, it seemed, should have done nothing without his knowledge. And yet Julius II had league'd with Maximilian, and excluded the Venetians, without informing him of it.

In the beginning of the year 1513, the Emperor had no farther regard for his new Allies, since he sent and proposed a fresh League to Lewis XII upon new Terms. He offered to assist him in recovering the Milanese, provided Lewis in return would aid him against the Venetians. Moreover, he demanded Rode, Lewis's second Daughter, for Charles of Austria his Grandson, and that for her Dower Lewis should assign him all his pretensions to Milan and the Kingdom of Naples. But that the performance of the Treaty might not entirely depend upon the Faith of the King of France, he required that the Princesses should be immediately sent to him, and Cremona, and all Gierradadda delivered to him as soon as the Duchy of Milan was recovered. Certainly, one cannot but admire the Emperor's assurance in making these proposals. He had not hitherto been able to continue the war against Venice, without the assistance of Lewis XII, nay, he thought he still wanted it, and yet made him an offer of his aid to recover the Milanese. But upon what Terms? Why, after Lewis should have been at a vast expence to recover that Duchy, he was to resign it to the Emperor's Grandson, with his pretensions to Naples. This is called upon people like true dupes. But after 1513. the ill turn Maximilian had lately served Lewis XII. it is not very likely, that he believed his proposals would be accepted. Probably, he made them only to hinder Lewis from joining with the Venetians. At the same time he intended to inspire these last with jealousy, and a fear of his uniting with France, that this fear might induce them to offer him more advantageous Conditions.

Lewis XII. hearkened to these proposals, as if he had some design to accept them, because he thereby hoped to create suspicions in the Swissers and Venetians, and incline them the sooner to join with him. As for the Venetians, they desired nothing more than a strict Union with France, and if any thing retarded the Negotiation, it was only the hope of an agreement with the Emperor, in which case they would have gladly renounced all sorts of Leagues. As for the Swissers, it was not possible for Lewis XII. to gain them to his side, though he offered them more than at first was demanded. Besides their hatred of him, the face of their affairs was altered, since the restoration of Sforza to Milan. Whilst that Prince was in exile, it was doubtful, whether in good policy they ought to engage in a war with France for his sake. But since he was by their assistance in possession of the Duchy, their Honour and Interest required their utmost endeavours to support him (1). However this be, Lewis's Negotiation with the Swissers not succeeding, he was under a necessity to join in a League either with the Emperor or with Venice, otherwise he could little expect to recover Milan.

Proposals of the Venetians
to Lewis XII.

In the mean time, the Venetians sent and proposed a League to him upon the same Terms with that of the year 1493, namely, that they would assist him to recover the Milanese, provided he would resign Cremona and Gierradadda. Lewis readily listened to their offers; but the Venetians themselves did not hasten the conclusion, by reason of their circumstances presently after.

Guicciard.

The King of Aragon having good Intelligence of what passed between Lewis XII. and the Venetians, informed the Emperor, and advised him to offer Verona to the Venetians for a sum of Money. This was the subject of a long, though fruitless Negotiation.

Death of Julius II.
Guicciard.

Whilst the affairs of Italy were in this state of uncertainty, Julius II. who was preparing to besiege Ferrara in the beginning of the Spring, died the 21st of February, having kindled a flame which his death was not capable of extinguishing (2). As soon as the news reached the Vicerey of Naples, who was still with his army in Lombardy, he approached Placentia, and entering without opposition, restored that place to the Duke of Milan. Parma quickly followed the example of Placentia, and was likewise delivered to the same Prince. No one was in haste to send assistance to the future Pope to preserve these places for him. On the contrary, the Princes of Italy could not see without uneasiness, that the Popes had footing in Lombardy, under a pretence which might, upon occasion, be used against most of them.

On the 11th of March, Cardinal John de Medici, who eleven months before was taken prisoner at the Battle of Ravenna, was elected Pope, and assumed the name of Leo X. He was but thirty seven years old, but had however great experience, having been employed in divers important affairs in the late Pontificate. He was neither so hot nor so haughty as Julius II. his Predecessor, but was much more artful and politic. I shall have occasion hereafter to add to his Portraiture some Strokes, which will more fully show his Genius and Character.

True for one

Ferdinand.
Guicciard.

Before the death of Julius II. Ferdinand was employed in framing a plot perfectly answering the name he had in the world. The beginning of the year he had sent two Monks into France to make some overtures to Lewis XII. by means of Queen Ann, to whom they had access. But as Lewis perceived it was not possible to make a Peace, or even a Truce with Ferdinand, without leaving him in possession of Navarre, he had appeared at first very cold. But at length, considering that he could hardly expect to recover the Duchy of Milan, whilst the King of Aragon was his enemy, because it was he that excited the King of England his Son-in-law, he determined, though unwillingly, to conclude with him a Truce, for a year, on condition the King of England was included, and Italy excepted. He reckoned, that during this Truce he should with ease be able to reconquer the Duchy of Milan, after which, he should be sufficiently strong to defend his own Kingdom against the English. Nothing was farther from Henry's thoughts than such a Truce, which would have broke all his measures, and yet, Ferdinand doubted not to act in his name, as if he were sure of his consent. This affair was begun in January, and the 8th of February, Lewis empowered Odet de Foix Lord of Lautrec, to treat with Ferdinand's Commissioners. In short, the Treaty was concluded at Arras in Spain the 1st of April. The Treaty ran, That there should be a Truce for a year, out of Italy, between the King of France, the King of Scotland, the Duke of Gelders, on the one part; and on the other the Emperor, the King of France, the Queen of Castile, and the King of England. Lewis XII. undertook to procure the King of Scotland's and the Duke of Gelders's consent, and Ferdinand engaged for the King of England. But as Ferdinand knew he should not easily obtain Henry's consent, he caused it to be inserted in the Treaty, that it should be ratified within a month by himself and Lewis XII. but that the other parties should be allowed two months; with express Declaration, that with regard to the Emperor, the King of England, the King of Scotland, and the Duke of Gelders, the Truce should take place, but from the day of the exchange of their ratifications. Never perhaps was seen any thing so bold as what Ferdinand did on this occasion. He perfectly knew that Henry would never agree to the Truce, and yet took upon him to procure his consent, as if he had been fully empowered to that end. The last Article, concerning the ratification, plainly discovers his thoughts. But it is still more visible, in that he not only took no step to persuade Henry to do what he seemed to desire, but even concealed from him the Truce as far as possible.

Guicciard.

As soon as the Treaty was signed, Ferdinand took care to publish his complaints, that he had been very ill-used by the Allies of the League; that the Pope and Venetians had acquired many places, but for his part he had gained nothing at all, and yet the Allies refused to continue the Supply to which they were bound, though the King of France still possessed several Towns in Italy, and the Spanish Army was still in the service of the League. But this was only to prepare people to see with less surprize and indignation, the private Truce he had just made with France, without the participation of his Allies.

The Eyes of the publick were fixed upon the new Pope, to see what course he would take. But he did not long leave the Politicians in suspense. Though whilst a Cardinal, he did not entirely approve of Julius II's Conduct, he pursued however his plan as soon as he was in his place. He was doubly concerned to keep the French out of Italy: First, as Pope, since Neighbours so powerful could not but be formidable to him. Secondly, as head of the House of the Medici, he had cause to fear, that if Lewis XII. recovered the Milanese, he would undertake to restore the Florentines to their Liberty. In a word, he wished to put an end to the Council of Pisa, which could be done only by engaging Lewis XII. in wars, which should compel him to make his Peace with the Church. Ferdinand had likewise the same views, to keep the King of France at a distance from Navarre, Roussillon, and the Kingdom of Naples. As for the Emperor, it was his Interest to disabuse France to assist the Venetians. But they had, none of them, any desire to carry war into France, but only to manage, that this diversion might be made at another's expence.

To that purpose they unanimously cast their Eyes upon Henry VIII. as a Prince extremely proper to execute their designs. He had ready Money, warlike Subjects, and could with ease transport Troops into some part of France remote from the Borders of Spain and Italy. In fine, he was exceeding desirous to signalize himself by illustrious Actions, and scrupled not to show it publicly. So, each of them laboured with all his power to confirm him in his design, to wage war with France, by putting him in hopes of being vigorously supported, though nothing was farther from their thoughts. Leo X. was no sooner in the papal Chair, but under colour of notifying his Promotion, sent him a Letter, assuring him, that he was fully determined to adhere to the League formed by Julius II. his Predecessor, and even to conclude a new one with England. But at the same time, he pressed the Emperor to make a Peace with Venice, and negotiated with the Venetians to hinder their Union with France, promising to use all his Interest with the Emperor to procure them an honorable and advantageous Peace. All these practices could not be managed so privately but the King of France had some Intelligence of them, so that he soon grew very jealous of the new Pope.

Henry did not want much Solicitation to carry his Arms into France. His thoughts were already bent upon a war. So, finding, the Pope, Emperor, and King of Aragon promised him to act vigorously, he did not question the favorableness of the opportunity to recover good part of what his Predecessors had formerly lost. And therefore, he readily agreed to form a new League with them, not for the affairs of Italy, which which was probably diffused, but to attack France from several quarters. And that the League might be the more secret, it was agreed, that it should be negotiated at Mechlin, between Margaret of Austria Governor of the Low-Countries, authorized by the Emperor her Father, and the Ambassadors of England (1), and that afterwards it should be approved and ratified by the Pope, the Emperor, and Ferdinand. This was another snare laid for Henry, which he perceived not till it was too late to avoid it. Though Ferdinand was then upon the point of concluding the Truce with the King of France, he made himself however one of the principal Parties in this League, as repugnant as it was to the Truce. The Substance of the new League concluded at Mechlin the 5th of April, about the same time the Truce was signed at Orthez, was as follows.

That within thirty days after the date of this Treaty, each of the Confederates should proclaim War with the King of France, and within two months invade him, viz, the Pope in Provence or Dauphiné: The Emperor in some place out of Italy: The King of Arragon in Bearn, Guienne, or Languedoc: The King of England in Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy, and that their Armies should be strong and well provided with all things.

That the Emperor (if he had not yet done it) should revoke all his proceedings in favor of the Council of Pisa. This shows how little Henry or his Plenipotentiaries knew of what passed at Rome, since it was now three months or more that the Emperor had abandoned that Council.

That the Pope should thunder his Censures against all the opposers of this League and abettors of the contrary party.

That towards the expences of the War, the King of England should give the Emperor a hundred thousand Crowns of Gold, at three payments; thirty-five thousand presently after the declaration of the War, as much more when the War was begun, and thirty thousand within three months after.

That the Emperor meant not to enter into this League as Guardian to Charles his Grandson.

That the Emperor and King of England should ratify the Treaty within a month, and the Pope and King of Arragon within two months; with this express declaration, that in case the Pope and the King of Arragon should not ratify the Treaty by the time appointed, it should however be in force between the Emperor and the King of England.

Lastly, The Confederates renounced all exceptions whatever, and particularly that which might be made to another's stipulating for them.

Never perhaps was seen more insincerity than in this whole Negotiation, since all the Confederates Henry alone intended to keep his word. Leo X ratified not the Treaty; Ferdinand, as will be seen presently, disowned his Ambassador: As for the Emperor, he received the Money from the King without troubling himself to perform his engagements. Thus Henry was the constant dupe of these Princes, who were a little too politic for him.

The Treaty being brought to London, Lewis Carroz de Villaragud, Ferdinand's Ambassador, approved and ratified it by Letters Patents of April 18th. He declared in these Letters, that though he had a sufficient power from the King his master, to conclude the League with the Plenipotentiaries of the confederate Princes, he had not been able, for certain weighty reasons, to be present at the signing at Mechlin. But being very sure, the Treaty contained only what was agreeable to the King his Master, who desired nothing more earnestly than it's execution, he approved and ratified, in the said King's name, all the Articles of the Treaty. And to remove all occasion of disputing the validity of his ratification, he inserted the Treaty word for word, in his Letters of ratification, and concluded it again with the Earl of Surrey the King of England's Commissioner, by virtue of a full power received for that purpose. Afterwards, the 25th of the same month, he swore to the observance of the Articles upon the Souls of Ferdinand King of Arragon, and Jane Queen of Castile. It is uncertain whether the Ambassador was himself deceived, or whether knowing it, voluntarily helped to impose upon Henry. All that can be said is, that the great precautions taken to hinder his being suspected of insincerity, are not very common with those who intend to act fairly.

It must doubtless be thought strange, that a Pope, an Emperor, and a King of Spain should thus join, to lay such a snare for a young Prince of twenty one years of age, and who was even Son-in-law to one of them. And yet it is scarce to be doubted, that the League concluded at Mechlin, in the absence of the Pope's and King of Arragon's Ambassadors, was thus projected to entangle Henry, under colour of keeping it the more secret. They succeeded so well, that Henry relying upon the diversions, his pretended Allies would make in Guienne, Bearn, Provence, Dauphiné, Burgundy, flattered himself that he might easily extend his Conquests in Picardy. To that end, he made extraordinary preparations by Sea and Land, which put him to a vast expence. But whilst we leave him employed in preparing for the next Campaign, it will be necessary to relate what passed in Italy.

The Venetians not being able to obtain a Peace from the Emperor, who pretended to subject them to very unreasonable terms, solicited afresh the Negotiation they had begun with France. On the other hand, Lewis XII, to whom time was precious, readily accepted their proposals. Thus the League between that Monarch and the Venetians was quickly concluded (2), upon the same foot as that of the year 1498. This was transacted by Andrew Gritti, who being then Prisoner in France, was commissioned to conclude it in the Senate's name. Presently after he was released, as well as Alviano, who returning to Venice, was made General of the Forces of the Republic.

When Lewis XII had concluded his Treaty with the Venetians, he ordered his Troops to march into Italy, where they arrived in June. As, by the Treaty of Truce concluded at Orthez, Henry was allowed two months to send his pretended ratification, and as that term was not yet expired, very probably Lewis still flattered himself that Henry would perform what the King of Arragon had promised for him; or otherwise he would not doubtless have sent his best Troops into Italy. Mean while, the preparations which were continuing in England, and the Hostilities, already begun at Sea since April, between the French and English, should have convinced him that Ferdinand had deceived him. However this be, the French Army commanded by la Trimouille being arrived upon the borders of the Milanese, Maximilian Sforza quitted his capital, and retired among the Swissers, who were to the number of seven or eight thousand Men, at Como and Novarra, where they expected supplies from their own Country.

Upon the approach of the French, Raymund de Cardano, who was still in Lombardy with the Spanish Army, retired without making the least motion to assist the Duke of Milan, though Italy was not included in the Truce of Orthez. Very likely Ferdinand was not displeased, that the French should make some progress in the Milanese, to keep them employed there, whilst Henry carried War into Picardy. At least, any other reason of his General's conduct can scarce be imagined. The Duke of Milan having no other Forces but the Swissers to oppose to the French, Milan and the rest of the Towns of the Duchy, except Como and Novarra, submitted to la Trimouille without offering to resist, whilst the Swissers, who were not strong enough to take the Field, remained immured within the Walls of these two places. Whilst the French were making these Conquests, Alviano took for the Venetians, Peschiera, Brescia, Valeggio, and at last Cremona, after a fruitless attempt to become master of Verona by intelligence.

About this time the Faction of the Adorno's, who in Genoa sided with France, found means to become superior, and put the City again under the Dominion of the King (3).

Lewis XII was now in possession of the whole Milanese, except Como and Novarra. La Trimouille knowing, the Swissers expected a strong reinforcement from their own Country, thought he should make haste and besiege Novarra, before the arrival of these Troops. He marched therefore to the Town, and in the expectation of taking it immediately, furiously stormed it. But whatever bravery the French showed upon this occasion, they were repulsed with a very great loss, which even obliged the General to retire to Rivata, a village about two miles from Novarra. Mean while, the Swissers proud of repelling so terrible an assault, and beginning to despise the French, before whom they had not yet dared to appear in the Field, suddenly resolved to fall out of Novarra, and attack the enemy in their Camp. This resolution was imme-

1513. diately executed, to the great astonishment of the French, who not being able to resist this unexpected attack, were entirely routed. But that was not all. Their confederation after the defeat was so great, that they thought it their only safety to repass the mountains, and with all possible diligence return into France. The news of their flight reaching Genoa, the Adorno's quitted the City to the Frengosa's their enemies, who chose for Doge Ottaviano Frengosa head of their Family and Faction. Thus, within the space of a month, Lewis XII got and lost Genoa and Milan, and Maximilian Sforza, who had been expelled out of his Duchy, took possession again. But it was the latter end of the year before he recovered the Castles of Milan and Cremona, kept by the French and Venetians.

The revolution in the King of France's affairs, occasioned much the same to those of the Venetians. Alviano their General no sooner heard of the French Army's misfortune, but he hastily retired into the territories of Venice, and besieged Verona. But Raimond de Cardona, who had offered a sort of neutrality whilst the French were in the Milanese, knowing they were out of Italy, turned his Forces against Alviano. He not only forced him to raise the Siege of Verona, but even pursuing him from place to place, obtained over him a signal Victory, which obliged the Venetians to refer their differences to the Pope, tho' he had declared against them by assisting the Emperor. The necessity of their affairs compelled them to take that step in order to gain time. They had lost all their Towns in the Milanese, and their own Country had been horribly ravaged by the Spanish Troops, even within sight of Venice.

Whilst these things were adding in Italy, Henry was preparing to pass into France with a numerous Army. But before I speak of the success of his first Campaign, it will be necessary briefly to mention what passed at his own Court, and which it will be worth while to insist upon a moment. Thomas Wolsey had been introduced to Court by the Bishop of Winchester. Presently after, he was made Privy-Counsellor, and as such, had opportunity to make himself better known to the King, and gain his esteem, as well by his own qualifications, as by the interest of the Bishop his Benefactor, who ceased not to cause the King to admire the strength of his genius, and observe how fit he was for the greatest affairs. Wolsey on his part neglected not what he thought capable of increasing the King's good opinion of him. To an indefatigable application, and extreme diligence in all the affairs he was charged with, he added a blind condescension for all his Master's passions. The King was highly pleased to see in his Court and Council a Churchman, less rigid and scrupulous than the Archbishop of Canterbury, or the old Bishop of Winchester. Wolsey danced, sung, laughed, and played with the young Courtiers who were most in favour; and if Polydore Virgil is to be credited, who loved him not, neither had reason to love him, he carried his complaisance so far as to lend the King his house for his most secret pleasures. However this be, his condescension, joined to his Talents for business, and a pretty extensive knowledge in Divinity which he had acquired, as well as the King, by reading the works of Thomas Aquinas, soon gave him the advantage over all the other Courtiers. When he saw himself well fixed, he made it his particular business to shew the King his errors since his accession to the Throne, and how his youth had been abused. By this method he insinuated to him by degrees, that he was ill-served, and wanted an able Minister, capable of easing him in the Administration of the most weighty affairs, and of shewing him the consequences. In a word, he so managed, that he became himself that Minister which he advised the King to seek, and by degrees was intrusted with the care and conduct of the King's principal affairs. His credit rendered him haughty, proud, insolent, and ungrateful to his old Friends. In short, he was taxed with all the failings of this nature, which Favorites are usually charged with, and which indeed few Favorites can avoid. Wolsey, like most others, grew extremely odious, chiefly because his Counsels were always self-interested, which the event discovered to all but the King, who was blind in that respect. His favor and credit, caused the most potent Princes of Europe, to strive to gain him to their interests, and glory, at least outwardly, in being of the number of his Friends. The reason is, because during this Reign, the affairs of Europe were in such a situation, that England was capable of making the balance incline to the side she espoused. Wolsey knew how to improve this advantage, to render himself the richest and most powerful Subject that ever was; but laboured not with the same ardour for his Master's honour, as for his own interest. After he was declared Prime Minister, he managed, during the space of seventeen years, all the King's affairs both Foreign and Domestick (1).

Before the King was ready to pass into France, the War was already begun at Sea. In April, Admiral Howard had put to Sea with thirty-two Ships of War (2), whilst the French Fleet remained at Brest, expecting six Gallies, which Pregent (3) was to bring from Marseilles. The English Admiral approaching Brest, resolved to attack the French Ships as they lay at Anchor. But upon notice that Pregent was arrived at Conquet, he sailed that way, to endeavour to take the six Gallies, and attacked them indeed with great bravery (4). But during the night, his Ship being grappled with Pregent's Galley, he entered it sword in hand, and at first caused great disorder. Unhappily, the Galley being afterwards disengaged, he was left in the hands of his enemies, with a few attendants, and being unknown, was knocked over-board with a half-pike. The loss of the Admiral caused such a conformation in the English Fleet, that they durst not continue the fight (5). The news being carried to Court, the King conferred the Office of Lord Admiral upon Thomas Howard, Brother of the deceased. Mean while, as the French Fleet, by receiving a strong reinforcement, was become superior to the English, the last returned to some Port in England, expecting the arrival of the new Admiral. The French, encouraged by the retreat of the English, sailed to the Coast of England, and even made a descent in Sussex, and carried away some booty.

Mean time, Henry was preparing to carry War into France, tho' none of his pretended Allies had yet made the least step towards performing the Treaty of Machlin. Leo X had not ratified the Treaty, and nothing was farther from his thoughts, than the sending of an Army into Provence or Dauphiné. The Emperor began to seek excuses not to enter Burgundy with an Army, though he had positively promised it. As for the King of Aragon, he had not only concealed from Henry his one year's Truce with France, but was even trying to amuse him with hopes, that he was instantly going to make a powerful diversion in Guienne. He so artfully acted his part, that it was June before Henry was fully informed of the Truce of Orthez. Provoked at such a Fraud, he dispatched an Ambassador to the King his Father-in-law, to upbraid him with breach of Faith, and summon him to execute the Treaty of Machlin, or rather, that signed by his Ambassador in his name at London. Whereupon Ferdinand, seeing he could no longer wear the mask, disowned his Ambassador, and said, he had exceeded his Instructions. He confessed however, he had concluded a Truce for a year with Lewis XII, being forced by the necessity of his affairs, but promised to do wonders when it was expired, and advised his Son-in-law to accept of the Truce, that they might afterwards unite their Forces, and jointly attack the common Enemy. But Henry could no longer rely upon such promises. Thus, by the Artifices of the Pope, the Emperor, and Ferdinand, he saw himself engaged to carry War alone into the Enemy's Country, which was to have been invaded in four several quarters. He was not convinced of their Insincerity till it was almost too late to recede, the greatest part of his Army having already passed the Sea, and just entering upon action. Happily for him, Lewis XII, deceived by the Treaty of Truce concluded at Orthez, had now sent his best Troops into Italy, imagining Henry would accept of the Truce according to the King of Aragon's Engagement.

Shortly after Henry received a Letter from the Emperor, with many excuses, that it was impossible for him this year to lead an Army into Burgundy, but he would punctually perform his engagement next year. Mean while, to shew, he meant not to forsake him, he said, he would come and serve as Volunteer in his Army. Thus, of the four Allies who were to act at once against France, Henry alone was charged with the burden of the

If Henry had followed his example, he would have terribly embarrassed those by whom he was deceived, but being greedy of Glory, would fiew he had no occasion for them. He had so relied on the sincerity of his Allies, that though the Treaty of Mechlin was not to be ratified by the Pope and the King of Arragon, till the 5th of June, he had caused the best part of his Army to pass over to Calais in the middle of May. It is evident, the ratification of the Treaty of Mechlin had been so long retarded, only to engage Henry beyond a possibility of receding.

Aug. 16.

Before the departure of the first Troops (1), Henry had beheaded the Earl of Suffolk, Prisoner in the Tower ever since the reign of Henry VII, who gave Philip I, King of Castile, a positive promise to spare that Lord's life. But probably, he gave the Prince his Son orders like those given by King David to Solomon his Successor, with respect to Jacob. The Historians have endeavoured to discover Henry's Inducement at such a Juncture, to put the Earl of Suffolk to death, who was not in condition to hurt him. But they have said nothing satisfactory (2).

The two Bodies of Troops transported to Calais departed thence the 17th of June (3), under the Command of the Earl of Shrewsbury (4), and the Lord Herbert (5), in order to march to Teroenne, to which they laid Siege (6). But the King departed not from England till the 30th of the same month, having constituted Queen Catherine Regent (7). He arrived the same day at Calais, being attended by Thomas Wolsey his Prime Minister, Charles Brandon another Favorite lately made Viscount Fife (8), with many other Lords (9). Whilst the Troops continued the Siege of Teroenne, he remained at Calais with a body of nine thousand Men, ready to march upon the first occasion. At last, having certain advice that the Duke of Longueville was approaching to relieve the Town, he hastened from Calais to the Siege, where he arrived the 4th of August. On the 9th, the Emperor came and conferred with him between Aire and Teroenne, and three days after repaired to the Camp and served as Volunteer under the King, making no scruple to receive a hundred Crowns a day for his pay. By this mark of esteem, and the imaginary honour he did the King, he meant to make amends for his Breach of Faith, and the hundred thousand Crowns received for an Expedition which he had never intended to make.

Mean time, the Duke of Longueville who commanded the French Army, approaching Teroenne, Henry passed the Lys with the greatest part of his Troops, in order to meet him. The two Armies engaged, but not long. For the fight was hardly begun, when the French, by what accident is unknown, ran away in confusion without any possibility of their being rallied. But the principal Officers chose rather to be taken prisoners than follow so dishonourable an example. The Duke of Longueville was of the number, with Chevalier Bayard, la Fayette, Buffi d'Amboise, and some others of the greatest Distinction. This Battle, if such a rout may be so termed, was called, The Battle of Guinegate, and by some, The Battle of Spurs, because the French made more use of their Spurs than their Swords. Whilst the two Armies were in view, before the Engagement, a body of French attempted to introduce a Convoy of Provisions into the Town, but were repulsed by the Lord Herbert, who was left to guard the Trenches. After the Battle, the besieged despairing of relief, surrendered the City the 22d of August, and the King, in company with the Emperor, entered on the 24th.

Teroenne
H. H.
Stow.

It seemed to be Henry's destiny to be always the Emperor's dupe. After the taking of Teroenne, Maximilian, who had only served at the Siege as Volunteer, found means to have the place delivered to him, and immediately ordered it to be demolished. It is hard to conceive what induced Henry to this condescension. All that can be conjectured is, that there was perhaps in the Capitulation, some Article against the razing of the place, but that altering his mind, he was willing to save his honour by delivering it to the Emperor. Though this were the case, there would be no less reason to be surprized at his management. 'Tis easy to perceive it was very advantageous to Charles of Austria, Grandson of Maximilian, that Teroenne belonged neither to the French nor the English. But what Interest could Henry have to lose so many Men, and so much time, to take a place in order to have it razed in favour of Maximilian, who had not merited such a Condescension (10)?

As the Season was not yet far advanced, Henry resolved, before the end of the Campaign, to besiege Tournay, whether he heard the place was ill provided, or the Emperor's Intrigues had again influenced his Council. For, the Conquest of Tournay, which lies at some distance from Calais, was much less advantageous to Henry than to the Archduke Charles, whose Dominions it secured; whereas Boulogne would have been, without doubt, much more convenient for the King, by reason of the neighbourhood of Calais. Nevertheless the Siege of Tournay was resolved, probably, because the Emperor hoped the King would give him that place as he had done Teroenne. But he found against him Interests stronger than those of the King himself, which opposed his designs.

Whilst preparations were making for the Siege, Henry paid a visit to Margaret Governess of the Low-Countries, who was at Lisle, and staid three days with her. Then he returned to his Army which was marching to Tournay (11), but the Emperor left the King upon some diffidence, the reason whereof is unknown. Next day, the 15th of September, the army arrived before Tournay, which held out but seven or eight days (12). Henry entered the City on the 24th (13), a month after his Entry into Teroenne. By the Capitulation, the Inhabitants were to have their ancient Privileges, upon paying to Henry a final annual acknowledgment of four thousand Livres Tournois, for ten years only (14).

After the taking of Tournay, the King calling a Coun-

(2) The chief Reason, as my Lord Herbert and others say, was his fear, in case of the King's death in France, the People being well affected to the House of York, should take him out of the Tower and make him King. Edmund de la Pole was Son of John de la Pole Duke of Suffolk, by Elizabeth Sister of Edward IV. But this reason seems weak, since Margaret Queen of Scotland, the King's Sister, was the undoubted Heir of the House of York, in case the King died without Issue. He departed from Lisle the 17th of EOber, and on the 24th arrived at his Palace at Richmond, after a glorious Campaign. I call it glorious, if the Success of his Arms be only considered. It is true, he had taken Terouenne and Tournay. But the first of these 1513. knew, he did not mean, for all that, to neglect his own Interest, that Language being properly only to amuse the publick. He had the more reason to believe it, as, even in the Treaty of League, and the Allies had evidently proposed to himself temporal advantages. And yet, he saw, the Pope had no sooner obtained his desire, but he took the words of the Preamble of the Treaty in the literal Sense, as if there had been indeed no other design than to labour for the Church, and under that colour, pretended to dissolve a League formed by himself. This convinced him, that the Pope, in drawing him into a war with France, had only his own Interest in view. On the other hand, he was not better pleased with the King of Arragon, nor had reason to be so. As for the Emperor, he had performed nothing of what he had promised. All these Considerations having at last opened his Eyes, produced a Peace with France, which was concluded the next year. But before we close this, it will be necessary to relate what passed during the Campaign, between the English and Scots.

He of Scots to make Peace with France.

War between England and Scotland. Buchanan Herbert.

James IV enters England. He fought a battle to Henry, Aug. 13th. XIII. p. 32. Hall.

Henry's Answer.

James IV seeing Henry ready to carry War into France, called his Parliament, and represented to them the indignities Scotland had suffered from the English, since the last Peace. Brette's affair was not forgot in this enumeration. But the best reason, he alleged to induce the Scots to a War, was, that France, the ancient and faithful Ally of Scotland, being about to be invaded by the King of England, he could not dispense with assisting her. This reason, though very plausible, was not however universally approved. Many thought it strange that the King should thus wantonly, and without an urgent necessity, break a Peace advantageous to Scotland, solemnly sworn to, and even lately renewed. But the King's Creatures and the Pensioners of France, whom Lamothé, the French Ambassador, had now prepared to serve the King his Master upon this occasion, carried it by a great majority, so that War was resolved.

Henry was in France, when James assembled his Army to invade England, pursuant to the foregoing resolution. But to keep some sort of formality, James writ him a Letter, and sent it by a Herald, who found him at the Siege of Tervuerne. This Letter, dated the 26th of July, contained the Grievances, James believed to have cause to complain of, and a declaration of War in case he desisted not from his Invasion of France. Henry could not send his answer till the 12th of August, the substance whereof was, "That he was not at all surprized to see him break the Peace upon frivolous pretences, since he therein only imitated the infincerity of his Ancestors and Progenitors. Then he upbraided him, that whilst he knew him to be in England, he never shewed, either by Letter or Ambassador, that he intended to espouse the King of France's quarrel, but waited for his departure to execute his unjust designs. He added, that knowing him perfectly, he had foreseen his breach of Faith, and for that reason, before he passed into France, had taken such a course, and so well provided for the defence of his Kingdom, that he did not question, by God's help, to frustrate all the endeavours of Schismaticks, excommunicated by the Pope and Council of Lateran. That besides, he hoped to have it very soon in his power to requite him, and in the mean time, would not fail to take the most effectual methods, to deprive him and his posterity of all hopes of ever inheriting the Kingdom, he was going so perfidiously to invade. After that, he set before his eyes the example of the King of Navarre, who for taking part with France, was dispossessed of his Kingdom, without hopes of being ever restored. As for the pretended grievances alleged in his Letter, he said, they had been so often answered, that all farther mention of them was entirely needless. But for the King of Scotland's summoning him to desist from the War with France, he told him, he did not acknowledge him for competent judge in his affairs with Lewis XII, and notwithstanding his threats, would continue the War. He concluded with saying, that he might be assured he would omit no opportunity to be

"revenge, wherein he hoped to succeed, with the help of God and St. George."

James stayed not for an answer to his Letter, to take the Field. On the 22d of August, he enter Northumberland, and took several places, particularly Northumb. Castle (1). The English Writers affirm his Army to be sixty thousand strong. Nay, some mount the number to a hundred thousand, which is hardly credible. It cannot however be doubted it was very numerous, considering the care Buchanan takes to shew, it was extremely lessened by defections, and by being kept unemployed for some time. The Earl of Surrey was then in Yorkshire (2), with twenty six thousand Men. But at the first news of the Scots entering England, he marched directly towards them, and the 4th of September came near enough to fend and offer them Battle, by a Herald, who reported that the King of Scotland accepted it for the Friday following. James was then encamped on the edge of mount Cheviot, where it was difficult to attack him (3). And therefore, the Earl of Surrey, seeing the Scots would fight only in so advantageous a Post, resolved to stay till they descended on the plain. The English not appearing on the day appointed, an old Scotch Lord (4) took occasion to represent to the King, that he had done enough to save his honour: That it was not prudent to fight the English in their own Country, but the best way would be to retire with his booty into Scotland, where it would be in his power to fight or avoid a Battle as he pleased: That as he had taken Arms only to make a diversion in favour of France, he no less employed the English Forces, without fighting, than by hazarding a Battle: That upon this occasion he ought not to listen to the interested Counsels of the French Ambassador, who only wanted to hazard some great action at another's expence, in order to free the King his Master from his present freights: But in serving France, Scotland was likewise to be regarded. This advice seemed too cautious to the King. As he had determined to give Battle, he fiercely answered, he would fight the English were they a hundred thousand. Mean while, the Earl of Surrey to draw him from his Post, marched along a River (5) which parted the two Armies, as if he intended to enter Scotland thro' Carlisle, the road to which place he seemed to take. James having notice of it, set fire to his Camp, and marched along the same River on the opposite side. But unhappily for him, the smook of his own Camp hindered him from seeing the English, who forded the River unperceived. Then James halting about Flodden, drew up his Army. Here it was the Earl of Surrey attacked him, having passed with difficulty a sort of morass between the two Armies. The particulars of this Battle are so variously related by the Historians of both Nations, that the one cannot be followed without departing from the other. But as to the success it is not the same. They all agree, the Scots lost the day, after valiantly fighting till night, which parted the Combatants. The two Armies retiring, the English knew not they were victorious, till the morning, when they saw, their enemies had quitted the Field of Battle with all their Artillery. The English own, they lost five thousand Men in this Battle, which was fought the 9th of September. But they say the Scots lost ten thousand (6). The Scots pretend, there were five thousand slain on each side, but confess their loss was very considerable by the great number of Lords and Officers of their nation killed in the Battle; whereas the English lost not one Person of distinction (7). King James was never more seen after the Battle. The English imagined they found his Body wounded in two places, upon a heap of dead, and ordered it to be put into a Lead-coffin, without daring however to bury it, because he died excommunicate. But the Scots affirmed it was not the Body of their King. They said that before the Battle, he had caused five Men of his own stature to wear the same Arms with himself, and that the Body which the English took for the King's was one Elphinstone's who greatly resembled him. However, they could not tell what was become of the King. One said their own private interest. To this artifice therefore 1514.

Leouis returned to free himself from his present embarrassment. At the beginning of the year 1514 he took care to renew the Negotiations concerning the marriage of the Prince's Remis his second Daughter with Charles Archduke of Austria, knowing, Maximilian and Ferdinand were equally desirous of it, especially upon the terms proposed by themselves. He started however difficulties, and was capable of continuing the Negotiation without entirely breaking it off. The Pope could not look upon this project without uneasiness. He was as much afraid of Milan's being in the hands of a Grandson of the Emperor and King of Aragon, as of seeing the French King restored. His interest required that Milan should remain in the Family of the Sforza's. The Swissers passionately wished it also. The Venetians too would have therein found a great advantage, if another interest had not prevailed. And that was, to oblige the Emperor to make Peace with them on reasonable Terms. But this they could not hope without the assistance of France; and this assistance could not be obtained without aiding Leouis XII to recover the Milanese.

Maximilian found his account in his War with Pe- nance, because it cost him little. Since the League of Cambray, he had always been powerfully aided by France, or Spain, or rather, had never made War but at another's expence. His Allies were necessarily obliged to find him Men or Money, otherwise they might be sure he would quickly change sides. Since he had left France, the Spanish Troops had done all in the War with Venice, and the King of Arragon, with all his policy, was not able to dispende with acting for him. It is not therefore surprising that he was so difficult, when a Peace was on foot, or used his endeavours to inflame the divisions among the Princes.

As for the King of Verdinand, since he was become master of Navarre, it was his interest to imbrail affairs, and cheerin in Italy, the hopes and fears of the several Parties, to make himself necessary, and that a Peace might not be concluded without him. He thereby tried to hinder Lewis from thinking of Navarre, and hoped at last to come to a Treaty, which should leave him in quiet possession of his Conquest. For that reason, he acted all sorts of parts, in order to attain his ends. One while, he assisted the Emperor against the Venetians, another while, he solicited him in their favour. Sometimes he excited the Pope and Switzers not to suffer the King of France to become master of Milan; and sometimes he offered to assist the same Prince to conquer that Duchy. This was only deceit and artifice to preserve a diffention for advantageous to him. However, his policy began to fail him. He had so forfeited his reputation with respect to sincerity, that he was no longer trusted. It was merely out of necessity, or from a desire to breed confusion in their enemies, that the rest of the Sovereigns made any Treaties with him, which, they were sensible, they could not rely on.

Henry VIII had with glory got clear of his first Campaign, but plainly saw himself indebted for his good success to Lewis's passion, who had neglected the defence of his own Kingdom, by sending his best Troops to recover Milan. The truth is, Henry, depending upon the Treaty of Machlin, and the diversions, his Allies were to make in several Provinces of France, had led into that Kingdom not above five and twenty thousand Men, too weak an Army to give him hopes of great advantages, had he been to deal with all the Forces of his enemy. Forbaken as he was by the Pope, the Emperor, the King of Aragon, how would he have diveded himself, if Lewis is XII had refused to defer his Milan expedition to another time, and march all his Troops into Picardy? Thus Henry should have considered, and in effect did consider, that he was more indebted for the Victory of Guinegate, and the taking of Tervuerne and Torrey, to the circumstances of the time than to his prudence or valour. He was therefore inclined to get clear of an affair, he had indelicately embarked in, with out flattering himself any longer with the imaginary assistance of his Allies. It was necessary however to conceal his Inclination, in order to draw from France advantageous conclusions in a Treaty. Such was the posture of affairs in the beginning of the year 1513. But before a week of the month of April of England in particular, it is requisite to show what steps were taken by the Princes concerned in the troubles of Italy, because that was then the chief point, on which all the other affairs did depend.

Leo X, being alarmed at the Negotiation, 1517 XII 10, X 1517 had renewed with the Emperor, concerning the marriage of the Sovereigns burned alike affected.

Louis XII turned with desire to recover Genna and Milan. But he perceived, that to succeed in that design, the Allies must be divided, otherwise there was not even the possibility of undertaking it. The Pope, Emperor, King of Aragon, and Switzers, were equally concerned to oppose it. And yet, as they had all their separate interests, he thought it would not be impossible to divide them, by offering to each apart, or at least to some of them, advantages as great as those they could naturally expect from their Union. Besides, he hoped, in treating with each in particular, to breed jealousies and suspicions among them, which would induce them to make hate and treat with him for fear of being deserted. He had the more hopes of succeeding this way, as most of the Princes with whom he was in War, were not over scrupulous, but rather very ready to sacrifice their Allies to 1514. of Rene's second Daughter, used all possible endeavours to reconcile the Switzers to France, that Lewis might be the less inclined to treat with the Emperor and the King of Aragon. But he wished that Lewis would ratify the capitulation of Dijon as to what concerned the Duchy of Milan; and on the other hand, exhorted the Switzers to be satisfied with a less sum than was promised by la Trimouille. This was the plan he had formed for that reconciliation. In short, he had so far gained his point, that the King of France had offered a Truce for three years, without however departing from his pretensions to Milan, and many of the principal Switzers were satisfied with it. But it was not possible to persuade that People to abate any thing of the Capitulation of Dijon. They even debated whether they should make a second incursion into France, to revenge the breach of that Treaty. Thus the Pope's pains were fruitless, and the Switzers still remained mortal enemies to France.

Ferdinand having advice of what was transacting in Switzerland, was afraid of being deserted, whether Lewis gave up his claim to Milan, or the Switzers accepted the Truce he offered them. So, without communicating any thing to his Allies, he speedily sent Quintana his Secretary to Paris, who renewed for a year the Truce with France upon the same foot with the former. Only by a secret Article, Lewis promised not to invade the Milanese year. In the publication of the Truce in France, there was no mention of Milan. But Ferdinand published it in Spain with that Article; so that the World was at a loss to know what to think of the matter. Lewis made no scruple to prolong the Truce, because he could not undertake to invade Milan and Navarre before he had made a Peace with England. Besides, he was very glad the World should think, the Truce, he had prolonged with the King of Aragon, would be followed by a Peace.

This was a very natural Consequence, and probably, it inclined Henry seriously to think of a Peace. But on the other hand, Lewis was going to receive a great prejudice by it, in that the Pope to break his measures with respect to Milan, laboured with all his power to procure a Peace between the Emperor and the Venetians. He desired above all things, for the good of his See, of all Italy, and of himself, that the French should never more set foot in Italy. Whilst the French were in possession of the Milanese, Italy had never been free from troubles, the Popes had been less regarded than before, and the Florentines had preferred their Liberty. These were sufficient reasons to make the Pope wish, they might never return. Besides, he had formed projects for raising his Family, which their neighbourhood might obstruct. One great means to attain his ends, was, to deprive Lewis XII of the assistance of the Venetians, which would infallibly happen, if it was possible to find some Expedient to make their Peace with the Emperor. Last year the Venetians, pressed by the Spanish Army, had agreed to make the Pope Umpire, and the Emperor had accepted him. But the affair had lain dormant ever since. Presently after Ferdinand's renewing of the Truce with Lewis XII, the Pope fearing a Peace would be concluded between the two Monarchs, at the expense of the Duchy of Milan, strove to renew the Negotiation between the Emperor and the Venetians. He knew, if it succeeded, the King of France would in vain expect the assistance of the Republick to conquer Milan. In short, with much Solicitation, he obtained from both Parties an engagement to stand to his arbitration, and to give him power to settle the Terms of the Peace as he should think fit. However, by a writing under his own hand, he promised not to pronounce Sentence without both their consents.

It was very difficult to make this Peace, because the War still continuing in the State of Venice and Friuli, the least Success was sufficient to cause the Parties to rise or fall in their demands. When the Venetians found themselves pressed, they very willingly agreed, that the Emperor should keep Verona; but then Maximilian would have also Vicenza, Padua, and Trevise. When his affairs were not prosperous, he was ready to leave them these three places, but then they could not think of making Peace without Verona. Thus the Pope, finding the various Successes of the War was a perpetual obstacle to his projected agreement, passed a provisional Sentence, ordering that both Parties should lay down their arms: That the Emperor should deposit in his hands, Vicenza, and whatever was possessed by the Spaniards in the Territories of Padua, and Trevise: That the Venetians should do the like with regard to Crema, and pay down to the Emperor fifty thousand Ducats: But that this provisional agreement should be deemed void, if the two Parties should not think proper to ratify it; but in case they approved of it, he promised to pronounce a definitive Sentence within a year. The Venetians did not think proper to ratify the Sentence, being perfwaded that, in their present Circumstances, a Truce was much more prejudicial than the continuation of the War. Thus the Pope's pains were ineffectual. Such was the situation of the affairs of Italy during the year 1514. We must see now what passed in England.

Henry, as his return from his glorious Campaign, thought only of Mirth and Diversions. The Parliament however met the 3d of January, but there was nothing done of any moment with respect to the publick affairs (1). Before the end of the Session, the King gave the Earl of Surrey, the title of Duke of Norfolk, which his Father had enjoyed, and lost with his Life at Bosworth-field, fighting for Richard III (2). By this change, Thomas Howard Son and Heir of the new Duke, became Earl of Brandon Duke of Suffolk. Favorites, was also created Duke of Suffolk; and Charles Ac. Pub. Somerfet, Earl of Worcester. Margaret of York, Daugh- XIII p. 339. ter of the Duke of Clarence, Brother of Edward IV, obtained likewise the title of Countess of Surm, as Heir of the Earl of Warwick her Brother, beheaded by Henry VII (3).

Thomas Wolsey had now been some months Prime Minister, without receiving other particular marks of his master's favour: But Wolsey was not forgetful of himself. The Bishoprick of Lincoln being vacant, he so ordered, that the King demanded it for him of the Pope, who had ingrossed the Collations of all the Sees, by anticipated reservations. Shortly after, Lewis Guillard Bishop of Tournay, neglecting to repair to his Bishoprick, since the City was in the hands of the King of England, the Pope readily supposed he had quitted his See, and gave the Administration thereof to Thomas Wolsey, both in Temporals and Spirituals. This was suddenly and almost at once a great addition to the new Favourite's Income. Leo X, not expecting much, either from the Emperor, or the King of Aragon, easily perceived, he might want the King of England. In order to gain his protection, he had disposed of the Sees of Lincoln and Tournay in favour of Wolsey, to win him to his Interest, by presents which cost him nothing. But after having fatished the Favourite, he must testify by some mark of distinction, his esteem for the matter. To that purpose, he sent him a Sword and a Hat, consecrated on Christmas-day, which the Popes were wont to present to Princes or Generals who had obtained some signal Victory over the Enemies of the Church.

Whilst the Pope, Emperor, and King of Aragon, were labouring to accomplish their projects, Lewis XII was not unmindful of his own affairs (4). Among all his enemies, none gave him so much uneasiness as the King of England, chiefly for two reasons. First, Henry was young, greedy of glory, rich in ready Money, and moreover always full of Supplies from his Parliament, especially in case of a war with France. Secondly, the Diversion he could and did make in Picardy, by means of Calais, rendered all Lewis's future projects in Italy abortive. He thereby kept the Forces of France so divided, that it was almost impossible to assist one another in case of Accident. Thus, it was the King of France's great Interest to remove this Thorn from his Side, otherwise he could not undertake to recover Genoa and Milan. Accordingly, he had been very seriously endeavouring it, ever since the end of the last Campaign, by the Ministry of Lewis Orleans Duke of Longueville, taken Prisoner at the Battle of Guinegiste. It was this private Ambassador who, in his frequent Conversations with Henry, laboured by degrees to open his Eyes, by showing him how little he

However this be, these Conversions had such an effect, that Henry told the Duke he was inclined to a Peace, provided it was upon reasonable Terms. Lewis XII having notice thereof, ordered the Duke of Longueville privately to negotiate the affair, and try to discover the King of England's real Intentions. Probably, Henry insisted some time upon his Claim to the whole Kingdom of France, and particularly to Guinnis and Normandy, which made the Duke apprehensive, his Negotiation would not be successful. However, to induce Henry to abate something of his pretensions, the Duke had orders to demand the Princess Mary his Sister for the King his master, who had lost Ann of Bretagne his Queen, the beginning of the year. This private Negotiation, to which only Thomas Wolsey Bishop of Lincoln was admitted, continued some time without making great progress, by reason of Henry's excessive demands. At last, at a secret Conference which the King himself had with the Duke of Longueville, he suddenly desisted from the hardest of his demands, and plainly told him, on what Conditions the Peace might be concluded, adding, he was fully resolved not to take less. Here is a Letter from the King to Wolsey, under his own hand, after the Conference, wherein appears what was his last resolution (1).

HENRY R.

Though this Letter has no date, it may, by several Circumstances be conjectured to be written in June 1514.

Lewis XII being informed of the King of England's last resolution, entertained great hopes of a Peace. There were however two Articles which troubled him. The first was to pay annually a hundred thousand Crowns, as a compensation for Henry's Claim to the Kingdom of France. This was in some measure to own the Justice of his Title, and pay him a sort of Tribute, which he could not resolve. The other Article related to Tournay, which he desired to recover, and which, however, was not mentioned in the King's proposals. But as to this Article, there was an obstacle which was not easily to be surmounted, and that was, Wolsey was concerned. It was not sufficient to gain Henry by Flatteries, or by giving him a Sum of Money in lieu of Tournay; the Favourite must also be made amends for the loss of a See which brought him a considerable Income. To endeavour therefore to agree upon these two Articles, Lewis sent Ambassadors to England. He chose for this purpose, Lewis d'Orleans Duke of Longueville, John de Selve first President of Raon; and Thomas Bohier, to whom Du Bellai gives the title of General of Normandy, and the Kings, in his Commission, that of Chevalier General of France. Mean while, the two Kings agreed upon a Cessation of Arms during the Treaty.

It was easier for the French Ambassadors to cause Henry to alter his last resolution concerning the first Article, than to obtain the restitution of Tournay. The reason is evident. In the first Article, the King alone was concerned, whereas in the second, the Minister's Interest was properly in question. Mean while, since Henry was determined to make Peace with France, Tournay could be of no farther use, and a Sum of Money would have been doubtless more advantageous than the preservation of that place. But Wolsey perceived when Tournay should be in the hands of the King of France, he would infallibly lose the Admiratization of the See. So, the Negotiation of the Ambassadors upon that Article was entirely fruitless. It was not the same with respect to the pension of the hundred thousand Crowns demanded by Henry. They found means to persuade him to be satisfied with a Million of Crowns, in which were included the seven hundred forty-five thousand, contained in the Treaty of Estaples; but whereof, indeed, an inconsiderable part had been paid. The Spanish Ambassador residing at London, used all possible endeavours to intervene in the Negotiation. But Henry would never suffer him, well knowing, he only intended to obstruct it. The Commissioners of the two Kings (2) having settled all the Articles, the Treaties were signed the 7th of August.

There were three separate Treaties. The first concerned only the renewing of the Alliance between France and England. The second was about the Marriage of the Princess Mary with Lewis XII. The third, related to the payment of the Million of Crowns. As these Treaties served for foundation to many others hereafter concluded, it is necessary to insert the Substance, at least, of the most material Articles.

I. TREATY,

Of Peace and Amity between LEWIS XII and HENRY VIII, concluded at London, August 7. 1514.

THAT the Amity between the two Kings should last till a year after the death of the shortest liver. That the Successor of him that died first, should give notice within the year to the other, whether he would prolong this, or make a new Treaty.

That all Impositions laid, within fifty-two years last past, by one King on the Subjects of the other, should be abolished.

That the Peace should not be deemed violated by the outrages committed on either side.

That neither of the two Kings should afford protection or refuge to the Rebels of the other.

(1) The Translator has thought fit to insert the Original Letter in the very words of King Henry, as it is to be found in Rymor's Fœderis; and intends to do the same by all the Original Papers, which Rymor hath translated word for word, as he has done this.

(2) The English Commissioners were, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Bishop of Lincoln, and Richard Bishop of Winchester. Rymor, Tom. 13. p. 422.

1514. By the 14th, 15th, and 16th Articles, the two Kings bound themselves to mutual assistance in three Cases : 1. For defence of one another's Dominions : 2. For recovery of the Territories with-held by other Princes : 3. In case one of the two Kings should be attacked on account of the present Treaty, and affirmed upon his honour, it was for that cause. In each of these cases the conditions were different (1). But in the last, they promised mutual Aid, though the Affiliant should be Relation, Friend, or Ally of one only, or of both.

Lewis included in the Treaty, as his Allies, the Pope, the Switzers, and the King of Scotland (2). On Henry's part, were named the Pope, Bologna, all the Towns of St. Peter's Patrimony, the Archduke of Austria, and the Switzers (3).

Scotland was included in the Treaty, but on condition that the Scots should commit no Hostilities against England, after the 25th of November.

That the Treaty should be ratified and sworn by the two Kings, and confirmed by the Parliament of England, and the States-General of France.

That each of the two Kings should endeavour to obtain of the Pope a Sentence of Excommunication against the infractor of the Peace.

II. TREATY,

Concerning the Marriage of LEWIS XII with the Princess MARY.

AC. Pub. XIII. p. 423. THAT Matrimony should be contracted by Proxies, and per verba de presenti, within ten days after the date of this Treaty.

That the King of England, [within two months after the Contract,] should convey at his own charge, the Princess his Sister to Abbeville, where within four days after her arrival, the King of France should solemnly marry her.

That Mary should have in Dower four hundred thousand Crowns, two hundred thousand whereof should be reckoned for Jewels, &c. and in case of recovery, Lewis should be obliged to restore only the Jewels, &c. which should be valued at the sum of two hundred thousand Crowns.

That the other half, amounting to two hundred thousand Crowns, Henry should pay, by deducting the sum out of the million the King of France was bound to pay by a late Treaty.

That the future Queen's Jointure should be as great as that assigned to Ann of Bretagne, or any other Queen of France.

That in case of Lewis's death, Mary should enjoy her Dower and Jointure during Life, whether she resided in France or England.

III. TREATY,

For the Payment of a Million of Crowns.

P. 448, 449. BY this Treaty Lewis XII acknowledged, that by the Treaty of Estaples, Charles VIII was bound to pay Henry VII, or his Successors, the sum of 745,000 Crowns, and that himself was obliged to pay the Arrears of the same.

Moreover, that Charles Duke of Orleans his Father, by an Obligation dated March the 7th, 1444, had owned himself debtor in a certain sum to Margaret of Somerset Grandmother of Henry VIII.

That these two sums not being yet paid, Lewis bound himself to pay to the King of England, or his Successors, a million of Crowns, as well for the Arrears of the said two sums, as on account of the good affection he bore him, and to the end their amity might be the more lasting.

That this million should be paid by Lewis to the King of England, by half-yearly payments of fifty thousand Livres Tournois, till the whole was discharged.

Thus the War, which had been undertaken on pretence of Religion, and for the Glory of God, ended in a Treaty, which mentions neither Religion, nor the Pope, 1514. for the Church.

On the other hand, though the Princess Mary had been solemnly affianced to Charles of Austria, Lewis XII and Henry VIII, made no difficulty concerning this second marriage, neither did they so much as vouchsafe to demand the Pope's dispensation, to absolve Mary from her first contract. Only, a few days before the signing of the Treaty, Mary declared in the presence of a Notary Publick, and other Witnesses, that she had been forced to plight her Faith to the Prince of Castile, Archduke of Austria. That moreover the Archduke having promised to espouse her by Proxy and per verba de presenti, as soon as he was fourteen years of age, had broken his word. She added further, that she was creditably informed, the Counsellors and Confidants of the Prince of Castile were infilling into him, to the utmost of their power, an aversion for the King of England her Brother. Up on these Allegations, the two Kings making themselves judges in a cause which doubtless belonged to the Pope's cognizance, thought fit the marriage should be consummated.

I have still to remark upon the third Treaty, That though Henry had declared to the Duke of Longueville, as appears in his Letter to Wolsey, that he could not make Peace unless the King of France would pay him a yearly pension of a hundred thousand Crowns, as a compensation for the inheritance he with-held from him, an expedient was found to satisfy him with much less. The whole was reduced to Lewis's bond to pay him a million of Crowns, two thirds of which were already due before the Treaty. Besides, that this Bond might not be considered as a compensation of the King of England's title to France, according to Henry's intentions, it was expressly said in the Treaty, to be in payment of the arrears of the seven hundred forty five thousand Crowns, due to the King of England by the Treaty of Estaples, of another sum due from the late Duke of Orleans to Margaret the King's Grandmother, and lastly, for Lewis's good affection to Henry. Hereby was caused to vanish the principal foundation, on which Henry had built his demand of a pension of a hundred thousand Crowns; a demand considered by him at first as the basis of the Treaty, according to his Letter to Wolsey. It may therefore be affirmed, that Henry was no less over-reached by the King of France in the Treaty of Peace, than he had been by the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of Aragon, in that which had engaged him in the War. This proceeded not from his misunderstanding his own interests, since it appears in his Letter, that he was very sensible of the consequence of his demand. To what then can his selfishness be ascribed but to the insinuations of his Prime Minister, who certainly erred not out of ignorance? Probably, Lewis XII found means to make Wolsey his Friend. We shall see still more plainly hereafter, that this Minister was much more mindful of his own than his Master's advantages, when they came in competition, and that he lost no opportunity of enriching himself.

Whilst Wolsey was employed with the French Ambassadors in negotiating the Peace, Cardinal Banbridge, Archbishop of York, died at Rome the 14th of July (4). The same day Cardinal Julius de Medici, afterwards Pope by the name of Clement VII, sent the King notice, acquainting him withal that he had prevailed with the Pope, not to dispose of the See of York before his pleasure was known. Whereupon the King demanded the Archbishopric for Thomas Wolsey, which was immediately granted. This Minister was then in so great favour, that he absolutely directed all the King's affairs, who had for him a very great esteem and affection. It may be presumed that he was now doing Lewis XII some good Services, since there are in the Collection of the Publick Acts, several Letters from that Monarch to him, beginning with these kind words, My Lord of York, and very good Friend.

August and September were spent in preparations for the new Queen of France's journey, in the celebration of the marriage by Proxies, in France and England, and in the ratifications of the Treaties. After which, Mary was conducted to Abbeville with a numerous train of Lords and Ladies, where the marriage was consummated the 9th of October (5).

What

(1) In the first Case, Lewis was to furnish twelve hundred Lances by Land, and five thousand Men by Sea, with convenient Shipping; and Henry ten thousand Archers by Land, and five thousand Men at Sea, with Shipping. In the second, Lewis was to lend Henry six hundred Lances only, and Henry him but five thousand Archers, with the same Sea-Forces on both Sides as before-mentioned. In the third, one was to aid the other at his Charge that was invaded.

(2) And the Kings of Hungary, Portugal, Dromach, and Navarre; the Dukes of Savoy, Guelders, and Lorraine; Ferme, Utrecht; the Bishop of Lige; the Marquises of Mantua, Monferrat, and Saluzzo; and the Lord of Sedan. Rymer, Tom. 13. p. 419.

(3) As also the Dukes of Creves, and Fuliers; the Henjo-Towns; and the Lord of Ligny. Ibid.

(4) He was poisoned by Rinaldo de Modena his Steward, or Chaplain, an Italian Priest, to revenge a Blow his master gave him, as Rinaldo confessed at his execution. Wood, p. 104. Steu, p. 496. There is a Letter writ by one Pace from Rome, charging Styefher, an Italian, Bishop of Worcester, with having a hand in his death. Ibid.

(5) The King and Queen conducted her to Dover, and then recommended her to the Duke of Norfolk's Care, who attended her to Abbeville. The other Persons of note that attended her, were, Thomas Grey Marquis of Dorset, Thomas Bishop of Durham, Thomas Howard Earl of Norfolk, and 1514. Whilst the Peace between France and England was treating at London, the Pope, Emperor, and King of Aragon omitted nothing, that they imagined would obstruct it. They plainly perceived, it could not but turn to their prejudice, and that the burden of the War would fall upon them. They were even afraid that Henry would join against them with France. Leo X had sent to Henry to persuade him to a Peace, and yet, when he saw it upon the point of conclusion, would have been glad, his exhortations had not been regarded. So, to cross the Negotiation at London as much as he could, he proposed a new League with the King of France, imagining it would be a means to abate his eagerness for a Peace with England. But as Lewis took a fortnight to give him his answer, he was afraid of being left alone, and for that reason, made haste and concluded a defensive League with the King of Aragon for a year only.

On the other hand, Ferdinand fearing, Lewis, after making a Peace with England, would invade Navarre, offered him his assistance to conquer Milan. But Lewis knew him too well to put any confidence in him. In short, the Emperor and Ferdinand, desiring at any rate to hinder him from concluding with England, sent him their consent in form, for the marriage of René his second Daughter with Charles of Austria their Grandson. At the same time, Maximilian ratified the one year's Truce made by Ferdinand with France. But all would not do. They had even the mortification to hear, that they were neither of them included in the Treaty of London; a clear evidence how little Henry valued their friendship. Notwithstanding all this, they both feigned to be extremely pleased with the Peace, though in their hearts they were exceedingly vexed.

It was expected that the King of France being freed from the War with England, would infallibly recover Genoa and Milan. The Pope was so persuaded of it, that he writ to exhort him to that expedition, though at the same time he used all his endeavours to break his measures, by an agreement between the Emperor and the Venetians. He even dispatched to Venice, Peter Bembo, afterwards Cardinal, to incline the Venetians to Peace. But these fearing the Pope was laying a snare for them, to take off the King from their Alliance, gave him immediate information, and thereby rendered him very jealous of his Holiness.

Leo X was forming at that time grand projects in favour of Julian de Medici his Brother. His design was to become master of Ferrara and Urbino, and to join these two States to Parma, Placentia, Reggio, and the City of Modena, lately purchased of the Emperor, in order to cast them into one State for this Brother, of whom he had a mind to make a great Prince. Nay, it is said, he intended to add the Kingdom of Naples; and to make that Conquest, had joined in a League with the Venetians. But as he saw the King of France would quickly invade the Milanese, he showed great regard for him, lest he should make an enemy of a Prince, who, if he came to be possessed of Milan, would have it in his power to obstruct his designs. Mean while, Lewis not being pleased with the Pope, pressed him to declare himself, resolving to know for certain whether he was to consider him as a friend, or an enemy. Leo, who perceived his intent, amused him with fair words, without however being determined, because his purpose was to regulate his conduct by the events of the War, he foresaw. This did not hinder Lewis from vigorously continuing the necessary preparations for his expedition into Italy, where he intended to go in Person the next spring. But whilst he was thinking of means to relieve the Lanthorn Tower, which he still held at Genoa, and by the help whereof, hoped to become master of the City, he received the news that it was surrendered by capitulation, and immediately razed by the Genoes. However this was not capable to deter him from his designs upon Italy.

Before I close the year 1514, it will not be unnecessary briefly to relate what passed in Scotland this year. James IV left two Sons, of whom the eldest, called after his own name, was not yet ten years old. By a Will, made before he took the Field, he left the Regency of the Kingdom after his death to his Queen, Sister of Henry VIII, during her Widowhood. The States being met the beginning of the year 1514, immediately acknowledged for King, James V, Son and Heir to the deceased. As for the Regency, there would doubtless have been great debates, if the loss of the Battle of Flodden had not made the Scots apprehensive, that the King of England would improve the advantage he had over them. There had never been in Scotland a Queen-Regent, and that would have been sufficient to reject the Claim of the late King's Will. But it was hoped, the Queen would prevail with the King her Brother, to leave in Peace a Country whereof she had the Government. This expectation was not disappointed. The Queen being declared Regent, and writing to the King her Brother, to entreat him not to disturb the minority of the young King his Nephew, Henry generously answered, he was equally inclined to Peace or War, and left it to the Scots to chuse which they pleased.

After this declaration, probably, Scotland would have remained in quiet under the Regency of the Queen, if that Prince had not married again some months after. She chose for her consort Archibald Douglas Earl of Angus, one of the greatest Lords in Scotland, and by this second marriage filled the Kingdom with confusion and trouble. As by the late King's Will she was to be Regent only during her Widowhood, the question was to appoint another in her room. Douglas's her Husband used all his endeavours to have her continued in the Regency. He affirmed, there was no other way to preserve Peace with England; and besides, Henry would be obliged to support the Queen his Sister in case any one should pretend to disturb her. But this last consideration had a quite contrary effect to what the Earl expected, upon those who dreaded his too great advancement. They knew, that being Husband to the Regent, he would always be countenanced by the King of England, and by his assistance, enabled to ingross more authority than they wished him. Alexander Hume Governor of all the Country North of the Frith, was the head of those that opposed the Queen's Regency. He was a proud and haughty Man, who could not endure a superior. During the late King's life, he had been President of the Marches bordering upon England, where he had committed such outrages, that as some say, for fear of being called to an account, he killed or caused to be killed James IV, when he was retiring out of the Battle of Flodden. However this be, Hume used all his interest to break Douglas's and the Queen's measures, and proposed John Stewart Duke of Albany for Regent. This Duke was Son of Alexander Duke of Albany, Brother of James III, who to avoid the Persecutions of the King his Brother, was forced to fly into France, where he died. He left there this Son, who being married, and adhering to the Service of Lewis XII (1), had received many favours from that Monarch, and acquired a great reputation. Though he had never been in Scotland, he was however the young King's nearest Relation, and Hume had interest enough to have him declared Regent. Whereupon the States sent Deputies to offer him the Regency, and to pray him to come instantly and govern the Realm in the King's name. Lewis XII dying whilst these things were in agitation, Francis I, his Successor, having great reasons not to displease the King of England, would not suffer the Duke of Albany to depart till he had finished his affairs with Henry. For this cause the Regent arrived not in Scotland before May 1515. During this interval, Scotland being without a Governor, the Diffentions among the great Men much increased, every one having time to form his Cabals against the Regent's Arrival.

The first day of the year 1515 was the last of Lewis XII's life (2). But the death of that Prince made no alteration in the situation of the affairs of the Kingdom. The Duke of Valois, who succeeded him by the name of Francis I, plainly discovered, by adding the title of King of France, that he intended to pursue his Predecessor's designs. Mean while, he did not think fit openly to declare his intentions, till he had settled his affairs both abroad and at home.

By the death of Lewis XII, Queen Mary his Widow was at liberty to dispose of herself, and to follow her own inclinations rather than the politick views of the King her

Before the Coronation was over, there were seven Jests and Tournaments held at Paris, by Francis de Valois, Heir to the Crown, at which the Duke of Suffolk, and the Marquis of Dorset came off with Honour. The King and Queen of France were Spectators; but the King was so old and infirm, that he lay on a Couch. The Duke of Valois out of envy, caused it to be, a German of prodigious strength and size, to be privately introduced into the Field, in order to oppose the Duke of Suffolk, who, though with great difficulty, got the better of the German. 1515. Brother. Before her Marriage, she had conceived an affection for Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, a most accomplished Lord. It is even said, the King had promised to marry her to him. But Lewis XII coming in the way, and her Marriage with that Prince being to make the Seal of the Peace between France and England, she was under a necessity to sacrifice her love to the good of the two Kingdoms. The Duke of Suffolk however waited upon her into France, though he was not of the number of those who were appointed to conduct her. Mazarini says, the Duke of Valois, presumptive Heir to the Crown of France, caused that English Lord to be narrowly watched, for fear he should give the King a Successor. This shows that the Queen's inclination was no secret. The death of Lewis XII happening within three months after his Marriage, the Queen Dowager was not willing to run a second hazard, of being given to another Husband not of her own chusing. Henry suspecting her design, writ to her the beginning of February, desiring her not to marry again without his participation. But the Queen believed it would be easier to obtain the King's pardon when the thing was done, than his permission to do it (1). So, in March, about two months after the death of Lewis XII, she was privately married to the Duke of Suffolk. Next day, she sent word of it in a Letter to the King her Brother, and taking the whole blame upon herself, intimated to him that he had in some measure forced the Duke to this rash action. Henry seemed at first very angry, but his anger was soon over. Their Peace being made, they returned to Henry, and were very well received (2).

The Parliament was then sitting (3), and as England was in profound Tranquillity, the Houses were only employed in domestick affairs, which are of little or no consequence to Foreigners. There were however three Statutes passed this Session which deserve notice. It was provided by the first, That unwrought Wool should not be exported out of the Kingdom, for the encouragement of the Woollen Manufacture. This Act has been often revived by reason of its importance, and yet even now, an effectual means is wanting to prevent the clandestine exportation of Wool. The second Statute declared all the King's second Letters Patents to be void, unless mention was made of the first. This was to prevent the King from being surprized. The third was no less necessary. It frequently happened that towards the end of a Session several Members went home, imagining, there was nothing more of moment to be done. Then the Factious took advantage of their absence, to propose and pass such Bills as probably would have been thrown out, had the House been more numerous. It was therefore enacted, That the Members who absented themselves before the end of the Session, without the Speaker's and Commons leave, to be entered in the Clerk of the Parliament's Book, should lose their Wages (4). I must now interrupt for some time the recital of domestick, to speak of foreign, affairs, which are to serve for foundation to what will hereafter be said with respect to England.

Francis I, was too much concerned to renew the Alliance between France and England, to fail of performing the Article of the Treaty, whereby the Successor of him that died first, was to acquaint the other whether he designed to prolong the time of the Alliance. As he intended to pass into Italy to recover the Duchy of Milan, it was absolutely necessary to secure the King of England. To that purpose, about the middle of March, he sent to the first President of Raan, his Ambassador at London, a Commission to renew the Alliance with Henry, as well as the bond for the payment of the Million, to which Lewis XII was obliged. This was done by a new Treaty, signed the 5th of April, and exactly like the former.

After all the frauds used by the King of Arragon to Henry, there was no room to hope for a perfect friendship between them. However, Ferdinand, who was not easily discouraged, sent to the King his Son-in-law a new

Ambassador, to propose the renewing of their Alliance. It is likely, he did not believe, Henry had so soon forgot his deceits, but it was for his interest that he should be known to have an Ambassador in England. This Ambassador arrived in May, but was suffered to wait in vain till October without being dispatched: Nay, very probably he would never have succeeded in his Negotiation, if Walley's interests had not caused the King to alter his resolution, never to have any thing to do with the King his Father-in-law. I shall speak more fully of this affair in another place.

Whilst the Spanish Ambassador was waiting in vain at London, Henry had two at Brussels, who made no greater progress. He had not dealt very gallantly with the young Archduke, in giving the Princess his Bride to Lewis XII, without any Ceremony. Indeed, Charles had not repaired to Calais the 5th of May last year, as he was bound by the Treaty of Life; but it could not thence be inferred, he had renounced his Marriage, at least before he was asked, whether he intended to consummate it. Henry was afraid therefore, the Archduke, having lately assumed the Government of the Low-Countries, and made a Treaty with France, would think of revenging the Affront put upon him. So, in order to found him, or prevent the effects of his resentment, he sent two Ambassadors (5) to propose the renewing of the former Alliance between Henry VII, and Philip I, their Fathers. But these Ambassadors were suffered to wait a good while at Brussels, without being much regarded, or receiving any answer.

The affairs of Europe were then in a situation, which would not allow the young Archduke to ingage in any Party. It was necessary, in order to take just measures, to wait the Success of the war, Francis I was preparing to carry into Italy. In all appearance, it would produce Events capable of altering the Interest and Projects of most of the Sovereigns. Since Francis's Accession to the Crown, he had sufficiently shown that he intended not to suffer Maximilian Sforza peaceably to enjoy the Duchy of Milan. On the other hand, the King of Arragon was under apprehensions for Naples and Navarre. Francis I, was a young Prince, full of Courage and Ambition, and it could not be doubted that he had formed great projects. So the Eyes of all were upon him, to see in what manner he would begin his Reign. He was making preparations, which discovered he had some great design in his thoughts, and did not take much pains to conceal that he had Milan in view. Mean while, he used for pretence of his Armament, the Invasion Burgundy was threatened with by the Switzers. But the League he had lately renewed with Venice, and his offer to Ferdinand to prolong the Truce, provided the secret Article concerning the Milanese was annulled, were plain Indications of his designs.

All this was not sufficient to make Ferdinand perfectly easy. He was afraid of being deceived by Francis, and that his preparations were intended for Navarre. To prevent this danger, he rejected Francis's offer, and withal made use of it to induce the Emperor and Switzers to join with him for the defence of the Milanese, intimating there was no room to question, that the King of France would turn his Arms that way. As for the Emperor, he did not want much Solicitation. He readily entered into all sorts of Leagues, because he ever found means to thrive at another's expence. There was more difficulty with regard to the Switzers, because Francis had among them Adherents, who endeavoured to disfile them from the League. But his Enemies prevailed in the end (6), and the League was concluded between the Emperor, the King of Arragon, the Duke of Milan, and the Switzers. Ferdinand played one of his usual artifices upon this occasion. He persuaded the Switzers, that to defend the Milanese, the shortest way was to attack the King of France in his own Kingdom. For that purpose, he engaged to make a powerful diversion on the side of Fonterabia, whilst the Switzers should invade Burgundy, and the Emperor, by continuing the war in the State of

The Queen (say the French) carried with her in Jewels, Plate, and Taphety of Louis XII, to the value of two hundred thousand Crowns: Amongst which was a great Diamond called le Mirair de Naples, which Francis would fain have redeemed at a great Price. Mrs. Ann Bullyn stands behind in the French Court. The first Statute concerning them is that of 12 Richard II, namely, That the levying of the Knights Wages shall be, as hath been used before this time. The Wages in this Reign were four Shillings a day for Knights of the Shire, and two Shillings at least for Burgesses, besides the Charges of going and coming, and Fees for Writs, &c. In this Parliament there was also another Statute made, importing, That whereas Archiebishops and Bishops d.d. upon feign'd and untrue Surmises, get themselves removed into the King's Bench, and could not by order of Law be removed and sent down to the Justice of the Peace for the future, the Justices of the King's Bench shall have power and authority, to remand and send down the Bodies or Indictments of all Bishops and Merchants, into the Countie, where the Murders or Felonies were committed. 1515. l'Enice, hinder the Venetians from assisting the common Enemy. His chief aim was to defend Navarre, in case Francis I. had thoughts of turning his arms that way, and then to hinder that Prince from becoming master of the Duchy of Milan. His League with the Switzers was equally subservient to both these ends. For if Francis I. invaded Navarre, the Switzers would divert him from his purpose, by making an inroad into Burgundy. But if he really intended to conquer Milan, the Switzers, as next Neighbours, and most concerned, could not dispense with assisting that Duchy. What Ferdinand had foreseen, came to pass. Francis having ordered his Forces to file off towards the Alps, the Switzers sent their Troops into Italy, where they seized the two Passes, through which only it was thought possible to enter the Milanese. When Ferdinand was assured the King of France was marching towards Milan, he disbanded the Army levied for the defence of Navarre, leaving the Milanese to be taken care of by the Switzers. The very army Ferdinand had in Italy, under the Command of the Viceroy of Naples, made no motion to join them. The Emperor remained without acting at Innsbruck. Leo X. who had also entered into the League, gave them no sort of Assistance. Thus the whole burden of the war fell upon the Switzers, without even the other Allies sending a penny of the Money that was promised them. But this was not strange. The Switzers were no more exempted than the King of England, and so many other Princes whom Maximilian and Ferdinand had served in the same manner.

Mean while, Francis I. having found means to march his Army through a place which seemed impracticable (1), the Switzers who guarded the Passes retired to Milan, and Francis advanced also towards the same City. When he approached, he offered the Switzers a Sum of Money to return home. This Negotiation was now in great forwardness, when they received a Supply of fifteen thousand Men of their Nation. This aid rendering them more stout, they resolved, by the Suggestions of the Cardinal of Sion, immediately to attack Francis, who lay encamped at Marignano, little expecting their coming. They were defeated, and ten thousand slain on the spot. After which, they retired into their Country, leaving Francis master of all the Milanese. Maximilian Sforza, who had shut himself up in the Castle of Milan, surrendered it by Capitulation, and was sent into France, to live as a private person.

Before Francis I. began his Expedition, Ottaviano Fregoso had brought Genoa under the Dominion of France, and instead of Doge, styled himself Governor for the King.

Leo X. had been in hopes that Francis would never be able to enter Italy. He had joined in the League against him, but so privately, that Francis knew nothing of it till he came to Vercelli. During the time between the King's arrival in Italy, and the battle of Marignano, the Pope was under great perplexities. He had sent an Army into Lombardy, to support the Duke of Milan. But when he heard, Francis had surmounted the difficulties of the Passage, he sent orders to Lorenzo de Medici who commanded his army, to commit no Hostilities against the French. At the same time, he told the King, his army was there only to guard Parma and Placentia. Mean while, as the affair of Milan was not yet decided, he durst not make too many advances to the King, for fear of displeasing the Allies, who would have it in their power to be revenged, if the King happened to be vanquished. But, after the battle of Marignano, he was immediately reconciled with him, and though he had grievously offended him, obtained however advantages which he could scarce have expected, had he taken his part from the beginning. The Popes make Leagues, and undertake Wars as temporal Princes, and when their affairs do not prosper, disentangle themselves as Heads of the Church, and Vicars of Jesus Christ. Though Leo X.'s behavior to Francis was such, that he deserved no favour from that victorious Prince, he obtained however whatever he pleased, and among other things, the abolition of the Pragmatick Sanctions, which the Popes his Predecessors had hitherto in vain demanded of the King of France (2).

Though Henry had not been able entirely to avoid the Snarles laid by the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of Aragon, he had happily got clear, but with a firm resolution never more to be thus over-reached. His affecting not to mention them in his Treaty with France, plainly showed he did not much value their friendship. But he was not so fortunate as to perfid in this resolution, since it was his own fault that he engaged in a fresh war with France, not so much for his own, as the Interest of others. His change may be ascribed to three several causes. The first is, his Jealousy of the glorious Success of Francis's arms in Italy. The second, to prevent the growing power of that Neighbour. The third and principal, Wolsey his Favorite's Interest, who thinking to have reason to complain of the King of France would be revenged. The two first need no farther Explanation. 'Tis well known, that Princes are subject to Passions like other Men, and that Jealousy may induce them to run counter to their Interest. 'Tis known likewise, that policy is as it were the hinge on which almost all their Actions turn. But on this occasion, Henry proceeded upon a very wrong policy, since nothing was more capable of securing the Peace of England, than the King of France's Acquisitions in Italy. The third cause requires a more particular Explanation.

Thomas Wolsey Archbishop of York, was Prime Minister, and chief Favorite. But this does not fully express the thing. It must be added, that he so absolutely governed the King, that he turned him which way he pleased. But he managed so artfully, that the King always fancied he took his own course, when he only followed the Suggestions of his Minister. Wolsey had great Talents for a person of his birth; but he had also great failings. He was excessively revengeful, greedy of Possessions and Honours, and intolerably proud. He no sooner saw himself fixed in his master's favour, but he sought means to remove from Court all those that gave him any Jealousy by the Kings esteem for them. Richard Fox Bishop of Hall, Winchester, the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who had been most in favour, received so many mortifications from this imperious Prelate, that at length they quitted the Court, not to be exposed to his Insults. Fox withdrew to his Diocese the beginning of this year (3). The two Dukes quickly followed (4), and Warham Archbishop of Canterbury retired also at the end of the same year. These old Ministers being thus removed, Wolsey became still more absolute over the King, who had only him to advise with in his most important affairs. The rest of the Privy-Council were all the Favorite's Creatures. The Historians unanimously agree, that Wolsey's Interest was the sole rule of the Councils he gave the King, and as this Interest answered his reigning Passions, Revenge, Greediness, Ambition, and Pride, the Reader must not be surprized when he sees him hereafter inducing the King to make so many false Steps.

Ever since Francis I. came to the Crown, he had been thinking of recovering Tourney out of the hands of the English. There had even passed in the beginning of the year a Treaty upon that subject, but to no purpose, because Henry demanded in exchange of Tourney, some places in the neighbourhood of Calais (5), which Francis did not think proper to grant him (6). But the greatest difficulty came from Wolsey, who was far from advising the King his master to resign Tourney, because himself would have lost the Administration of that Bishoprick and the Abby of St. Amand, which brought him a great Revenue. On the contrary, he had been very urgent with Francis I. to bestow some good Benefice on Lewis Guildford Bishop of Tourney, that he might suffer him peaceably to enjoy his Administration. Francis had promised him, but without intending to keep his word. Instead of assisting him to keep the Administration, he secretly persuaded the Bishop to sue to the Pope for his restoration, and seconded his petition to the utmost of his power. He was of opinion, that when Wolsey ceased to be Administrator, the restitution of Tourney would become much easier.

Whilst Francis was still in France, employed in preparing for his Italian Expedition, the Pope, yet uncertain of the Success of that Enterprize, did not much regard the Bishop's Solicitations. But when he saw that Prince master of Genoa, and entered the Battle at the head of a powerful army, he readily granted a Bull to Guildford, restoring him to his Bishoprick, and even allowing him to make use of the secular Arm to obtain possession. This Bull, which sacrificed the King of England's and his Minister's Interest, to those of the French King and the Bishop of Tournay, would seem very strange, if the consideration of the time and circumstances did not make the wonder cease. Leo X had given just cause to Francis to complain of his Conduct, and saw that Monarch ready to take possession again of the Milanese, and conclude a Treaty with the Swissers in order to send them back into their own Country. It was therefore his Interest to appease him, by granting a favour he so eagerly desired. Mean while, Henry was extremely offended at this Bull, which restored to the Bishoprick of Tournay, a Prelate who refused to swear Fealty to him, and on which the King of France and the Bishop of Tournay, might proceed to raise a Sedition in the City. He therefore gave orders to his Ambassador at Rome, to expostulate with the Pope, and represent to him the consequences of his partiality. Leo X could not help owning it. But at that very time Francis gaining the battle of Maringano, and preparing to make him feel the effects of his resentment, it was no proper Season to incense him further by revoking the Bull. This convinced Wolsey that Francis was the real Author of the Bishop's restoration. Mean while, the Pope, being embarrassed, chose, upon the King of England's opposition, to leave the affair undecided, by referring it to the examination of two Cardinals, who, probably, were ordered not to hasten the conclusion. In the mean time, Wolsey was uncertain whether he should keep the Bishoprick of Tournay. And that was precisely what the King of France wanted, that this uncertainty might induce the selfish Minister to find some Expedient to make himself amends, after which it was apparent, he would no longer oppose the restitution of Tournay. At the same time, to preserve his friendship, which was very necessary, by reason of his Credit with the King his master, he promised to assist him in procuring a Cardinal's Cap. Wolsey was extremely ambitious of that Dignity. After the death of Cardinal Bambridge, he was in hopes of succeeding him in the Cardinalate, as well as in the Archbishoprick of York. He had even employed to solicit it in his name, Cardinal Adrian de Corneto (1) the Pope's Collector in England, under whom Polydore Virgil served as Sub-Collector. But Cardinal Adrian, instead of serving him as he had promised, had done him ill Offices. Wolsey being informed of it, was so incensed, that on some slight pretence, he committed Polydore to the Tower. Then he caused the King to write to the Pope with his own hand, to desire him to appoint another Collector in Cardinal Adrian's room. The King's Letter was so strong and passionate, that the Pope thought fit to comply with his request. However in his Brief of advice, he told him, he knew very well his anger against Cardinal Adrian was inflamed into him by Wolsey. Mean while, Polydore Virgil continued in the Tower, till at length Cardinal Julius de Medici, and the Pope himself interceded for him, by Letters of August the 30th, and September the 3d. As this was at the very time that Francis was soliciting a Cardinal's Cap for Wolsey, Wolsey did not think proper to retort the Pope a thing of so little consequence. So Polydore came out of the Tower, where he had been about a year. This ill Treatment was, doubtless, one of the reasons that induced him to remember all the ill qualities of Cardinal Wolsey, in his History of England.

Wolsey having at length obtained a Cardinal's Cap, was transported with joy when he received the news by an Express sent by the King of France (2). But though he was highly obliged to that Monarch, this favour begot in his breast much less Gratitude, than the injury he imagined to have received in the affair of Tournay, had caused Repentment. He resolved therefore, in order to be revenged, to endeavour to set the King his master at variance with Francis, and cause him to enter into a new League against France. Herein he gratified three of his predominant passions; his Pride, in letting Europe see, that Sovereigns themselves offended him not with impunity; his Revenge, in creating Francis great troubles; and his own Interest, in securing the administration of the Bishoprick of Tournay. Indeed, a rupture between the two Kings was an effectual means to hinder Gaillard's restoration to his See. This is observed by Historians as the principal Cause of the alteration we are going to behold in Henry's Conduct. Jealousy and Policy may have had some influence too, but less as true causes, than as motives used by Wolsey to inflame the King's mind.

Probably, under colour that his honour was concerned, he represented to him the necessity of humbling the pride of the French King, and insinuated, how dangerous it was for England that France should grow too powerful. When he had prepared Henry, he privately sent word to the Emperor, that it would not be impossible to disengage the King his master from the interests of France. It may easily be guessed, Maximilian received this Overture with joy. Besides that, being without aid and allies, he saw himself little able to preserve his Conquests in Italy, he knew, which way soever he was treated with, he should always be furnished with Money. Whilst Wolsey was projecting to negotiate with the Emperor, the Spanish Ambassador, who had heavily passed some months at London, was looked upon at Court with a much more favorable Eye. Nay, a Treaty was begun with him about renewing the alliance between England and Spain, which being ended the 19th of October, contained however only a confirmation of the ancient Treaties of Amity.

Mean while, the Emperor, willing to improve the present opportunity, sent to the King a Milanese Ambassador, to desire aid in the name of Francesco Sforza, who was in Germany, and had assumed the title of Duke of Milan, ever since Maximilian his Brother had resigned his right to the King of France. Though Wolsey had taken care to dispose Henry to a rupture with France, he was not, it seems, fully determined. Francesco Sforza's request, or rather the Emperor's, seemed to him so important, that he desired to have the opinions of the Bishop of Winchester, and the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who to that intent were sent for to Court. The Council being met to debate upon this affair, Cardinal Wolsey speaking first, made a long Speech full of resentment against France, labouring to demonstrate how much it was for the interest of England to oppose her growing power (3). The Bishop of Durham and all the new Counsellors strenuously supported the Cardinal's opinion. But the old ones endeavoured to dissuade the King from breaking the Peace lately concluded with France, since the new King had given him no cause, and advised him rather to turn his arms against Scotland. Henry, who was already prepossessed, took a middle way, insinuated, doubtless, by his Minister: And that was, privately to assist the Emperor and Francesco Sforza (4). Whereupon, he sent orders to Pace (5), his Ambassador to Maximilian, to treat with them, and, to promote the Treaty, returned him large sums of Money (6). Thus he was gradually engaged, without foreseeing that these steps must necessarily end in an open War, as Wolsey desired.

There is in the Collection of the Public Acts a Paper, The Duke showing that the Cardinal did not forget himself in his Negotiations. It is a promise from the Duke of Milan's Secretary, who, by virtue of an express power from the Duke his Master, engaged to pay the Cardinal a yearly Pension of ten thousand Ducats, to commence from the Day of his Master's restoration. It is true, this Paper being neither dated nor signed, may be considered only as a draught of this Contract; but it is however a proof of the Cardinal's selfish temper. The Emperor no sooner heard that Henry was inclined to assist him against France, than he dispatched to England Matthew Skinner Cardinal of Sion to negotiate a League with Hall. This is the same Prelate, who, a little before, had encouraged the Swissers to give Battle to Francis I.

The Parliament met again the 12th of November. But as it was not yet time to lay before the Houses the King's resolution with regard to France, there was no mention of War or any foreign affair. The Clergy in a Synod held at the same time, returned an answer to the Pope concerning his demand of an extraordinary Subsidy, on pretence of an apparent War with the Turks. They acknowledged, that they were so exhausted by the late War with France, undertaken at the instance of Julius II, for the defence of the Church, that they were not in condition to grant a new Subsidy: That besides, by a decree of the Council of Constance, the Pope could lay no imposition on the Clergy without the consent of a General Council.

Whilst the English were thus endeavouring to screen themselves from the oppressions of the Court of Rome, they beheld one rising in their own Body, like a new 1117. Pope, whom they foresaw, it would be more difficult to resist than him at Rome, because he was supported by the King: I mean Wolsey. Since that Prelate was promoted to the Cardinalate, he was grown more vain, proud, and imperious than ever. He never stirred without a Prince's retinue, always attended by a crowd of Domesticicks, causing the Cardinal's Hat to be carried before him like a sort of Trophy, and having it placed on the Altar when he went to the King's Chapel (1). He was the first Clergyman in England that wore Silk in his Vestments, and used Gold in his Saddles. In a word, he devised all sorts of ways to distinguish himself. Every one took such offence at his pride, that it was incessantly talked of with indignation. But no Man durst open his Mouth before the King, since the old Bishop of Winchester for only glancing upon it, was so ill received, that shortly after he withdrew to his Diocese. The Archbishop of Canterbury was no less offended than the rest, to see the Archbishop of York affect thus so great a distinction. But what gave him most offence was, to see the Cross of York carried before the Cardinal, though he was in the Province of Canterbury. I have spoken elsewhere of this contest between the two Archbishops, which, after having caused violent quarrels, could be decided but by the King's express commands to the Archbishops of York, not to have the Cross carried before them in the other Province. But Wolsey, who thought himself much above his Predecessors, prepared to revive the contest, in contempt of these Prohibitions. Warham, who was of a peaceable temper, easily perceived, that though he should attempt to hinder it, he should not succeed, because Wolsey had an absolute sway over the King. So, not to have continually this object before his Eyes, he desired the King's leave to resign the Chancellorship, and retire to his Palace. His request was immediately granted; and the same day the King gave the Seals to Cardinal Wolsey. In all appearance, he had created Warham so many mortifications only to oblige him to quit his Office, with which he desired to be invested himself. To support the splendour of his dignity with more State than any other before him, the King loaded him every day with fresh favours, Prebends, Wardships, and the like, which continually increased his Revenues. Besides the Archbishopric of York and the Chancellorship, he had in Farm, upon easy terms, the Bishopricks of Bath and Wells, and Hereford (2), held by Italians residing at Rome. But this was not sufficient to satisfy him. I must now, before I close the year 1515, briefly mention the affairs of Scotland, the Knowledge whereof is requisite for the better understanding the events related hereafter.

The Duke of Albany, who had been declared Regent in 1513, arrived not in Scotland till May 1515. He found the Kingdom full of Factions and Divisions, which made him sensible, the Administration committed to him would prove very troublesome. But what gave him most uneasiness was, that the King of England was but too much concerned in what passed in Scotland, and fomented these dissensions to the utmost of his power. Under colour that Scotland had been sometime without a Regent, Henry VIII, as Uncle of the young King, had taken the Title of Protector of Scotland, and by virtue thereof, his Ambassadors at Rome demanded of the Pope the Ecclesiastical Preferments of that Kingdom, which he bestowed on his Creatures. But as soon as the Duke of Albany was arrived, he writ to the Pope, in the young King's name, sharply complaining of the King of England's Incroachments, and the Court of Rome's condescension. He even threatened the Pope in his Letter, not to apply to him for the future upon any account whatsoever, if this Grievance were not speedily redressed (3).

Rashman.

The Duke of Albany, though of Scotch Extraction, was a stranger to Scotland (4), from whence the Duke his Father had retired in 1483. As he desired, in the beginning of his Regency, to be informed of the State of the Kingdom, he unhappily applied to Hepburne Bishop of Murray, a hot and revengeful Man, who took this occasion to be revenged on his Enemies. The Bishop, being Prior of St. Andrew's, had been elected Archbishop of that Church in the beginning of the present Reign. But he was forced to resign the Archbishopric to Forman, Bishop of Murray, who was armed with the Pope's Bull. However, Forman would never have ventured to make use of this Bull, had he not been supported by Alexander Hume a potent Lord before-mentioned. By his credit and authority, Forman was installed in St. Andrew's, having resigned the Bishopric of Murray to Hepburne, and promised to pay him a certain Pension. Hepburne finding he had a fair opportunity to be revenged, gave the Regent such a Character of Hume, that when he came to Court he was looked upon with a very ill Eye. Hume being naturally very proud and high-spirited, resolving to let the Regent see, no Man should slight him with impunity, went over to the Queen Dowager, and persuading her that the King her Son was in danger, advised her to carry him into England. The Regent hearing of this plot, suddenly went to Sterling Castle and secured the young King's Person. But to hinder his Enemies from putting an ill construction on this action, he renewed his Oath of Allegiance to the King, and committed the care of his education to three Persons of great credit.

Alexander Hume and his Brother William seeing their Plot was discovered, fled immediately into England, and were quickly followed by the Queen and her Spouse the Earl of Angus. Whereupon, the Regent sent Ambassadors to Henry to justify his conduct, and at the same time so artfully treated with the Fugitives, that he prevailed with them to return into Scotland. But the Queen being big with Child, was forced to stay at Herbottle Castle in Northumberland, where she was delivered (5) of a Daughter, called Margaret (6). The sequel of this affair shall be related in another place.

The death of King Ferdinand (7), in February 1516, broke the measures taken by Cardinal Wolsey, to engage all Europe in a War with France. Thus, notwithstanding the Cardinal's projects, Henry was forced to remain in peace, because the interests of the rest of the Princes were not agreeable to his, or rather to the passions of his Minister. But though Europe was peaceable for some time, it will be however necessary to relate in each year of this Peace, the situation of the affairs of the principal States, in order to shew the occasion of the following Wars.

Nothing remarkable passed in England in the beginning of the year 1516, except the Birth of a Princess, whom the Queen brought into the World the eighteenth of February, and called Mary (8). Cardinal Wolsey commonly called the Cardinal of York, ever mindful of what could procure him any advantage, caused those who had managed the King's Money, to be called to a strict account. The most part however were spared. But those were severely punished who had not the address to make the Minister their Friend (9).

After Ferdinand's decease, the Kingdom of Arragon came of course to Joanna his eldest Daughter, already Queen of Castile. But that Princess was incapable of governing her Dominions by reason of her defect of understanding, which had obliged the King her Father to keep her confined. So the Administration of these two Kingdoms with all their dependencies, could not be disputed with Charles of Austria, Joanna's eldest Son, and Sovereign of the Low-Countries. But as that Prince lived in Flanders, Ferdinand had left by his Will the Regency of Arragon to Alphonso his natural Son Bishop of Saragossa, and that of Castile to Cardinal Ximenes, till Charles should come himself and assume the Government. Mean while, when Ximenes would have taken possession of the Regency of Castile, Adrian Florentio, Doctor in Divinity, who managed the Prince of Austria's affairs in Spain, produced Letters Patents from his Master, constituting him

1516. Regent of that Kingdom. But Ximenes refused to acknowledge him as such, pretending that Charles had not power to appoint a Regent before he was received for Governor. The contest was however adjusted by this expedient, that the Orders should be signed by both. But the Cardinal left the Doctor the bare name of Regent only, and discharged all the Functions himself. Mean while, Charles took the Title of King of Castile, with the consent of the States of that Realm. But the Aragonians, more jealous of their Privileges than the Castilians, refused to give him the Title of King of Aragon, whilst his Mother Joanna was alive. Nay, there was a party in the Kingdom who maintained, that Joanna herself could not pretend to the Crown of Aragon, because the Daughters were excluded by the Laws of the Realm, and therefore Charles could not derive from his Mother a right she never had. But others affirmed, that the exclusion of the Females extended not to their Male-Heirs. This was much the same case as happened formerly in France, in the dispute between Edward III. and Philip of Valois. I shall enter no farther into the affairs of Spain. What I have said is sufficient to shew the necessity Charles was under, of going thither, and how dangerous it would have been for him, to engage in a War against France, in the beginning of his unsettled a Reign. Accordingly, he neglected nothing to renew the Treaties of Peace and Alliance as well with France as England, but with liberty to take other measures when his Affairs should be in another situation. Just before the King of Aragon's death, he had, as Sovereign of the Low-Countries, renewed the Alliance with England, by a new Treaty concluded at Brussels the 24th of February this year (1). About a month after, Henry, who was contriving to form a League against France, ordered his Ambassador to treat with Charles upon that head. But Ferdinand's death so changed the face of affairs, that Henry was forced to be satisfied with a bare defensive League, which I shall presently mention, having first related the success of an expedition made by the Emperor into Italy.

It was not without reason that Maximilian had readily embraced the opportunity offered him by Cardinal Wolsey, of making War upon France. There was no more likelihood of his being able to keep his Conquests in the State of Venice, since Francis I. was become master of the Milanese, and had joined Forces with the Venetians. Besides, he could expect no farther assistance from the Pope, who had lately agreed with Francis. As for the Spanish Army, which was retired to Naples, it was not easy to cause them to return, since they were necessarily to march through the Ecclesiastical State. On the other hand, King Ferdinand's death had chartered the posture of affairs, and quite destroyed the Emperor's hopes. So far was the new King of Castile from having any thoughts of a War with France, that it highly concerned him to keep Peace with that Kingdom, in order to have time to settle his affairs in Spain. Thus the Emperor, contrary to his usual method, was forced to act alone, during this year, in the expectation of so embroiling affairs, that other Potentates should at length be constrained to join with him. He had already received some of the King of England's Money, and Cardinal Wolsey put him in hopes of still larger sums. With this aid, he assembled an Army of about twenty thousand Men, Germans and Switzers, and in March entered the State of Venice, whilst the Venetians, assisted by a Body of French Troops commanded by Lautrec, were besieging Brescia. Upon his approach, the French and Venetians raised the Siege, and after making a shew of opposing his passages of the Rivers, retired to Milan to avoid a Battle. Thus the Emperor approached Milan without much difficulty.

The French were in so great Consternation that they were like to abandon both the City and Duchy, and retire into France. If the Emperor had made all the haste he could, he would have doubtless constrained them to execute that resolution. But having spent two or three days to no purpose, by the time he came before Milan the French had received news, that ten thousand Switzers of the Cantons in Alliance with France were coming to their assistance, and were within a day's march.

The arrival of the ten thousand Switzers at Milan, threw both sides into an equal Consternation. The French, who considered these Troops as a sure aid, were struck with astonishment when they heard that they absolutely refused to fight against the Switzers in the Emperor's Army. These last, on their part, demanded their pay with such boldness, that Maximilian was afraid, it was a pretence not to join battle with their Countrymen newly arrived at Milan. He had no Money for them, and was apprehensive the French had but too much to corrupt them. So, when it was least expected, he suddenly retired, after which, having no Money to pay them, the Army disbanded of themselves.

Having thus missed his aim, the Emperor was forced upon new Trials to engage the Pope, the King of England, the young King of Castile his Grandson, in a League against France. But this project was not easy to be executed. The Pope had his private views, which sufficed him not to break openly with Francis. Charles's Council were better advised than to agree, that their master should engage to gratify his Grandfather's passion at a time when he was necessarily obliged to go into Spain, and take possession of his Kingdoms. Thus the Emperor's whole refuge lay in the assistance he could expect from England. But as there was no likelihood, that Henry would undertake a War of which he was to bear all the expence, Maximilian bethought himself of a Device to prefigure his good disposition towards him, or at least to draw Money from him; and that was, to declare to Robert Wingfield the English Ambassador at his Court, that he was tired with the burden of the Empire, and having a particular esteem for the King his master, intended to resign it to him. For that purpose, he charged him to write to the King, that if he would come to Triers, he would call a Diet and settle that grand affair, after which, he offered to wait upon him to Rome, to see him receive the Imperial Crown. Moreover, he put him in hopes, he would resign to him his right to the Duchy of Milan, and assist him to conquer it. Henry easily perceived Maximilian's aim in making such an offer, and therefore writ to his Ambassador to thank the Emperor for his good Intention, desiring him to defer the execution of this project to a more convenient Season, when the French should be expelled out of Italy. Mean while, in return for his goodwill, he sent him some Money, excusing the former defect of payment, with laying the blame on a Genoa Banker (2).

Whilst the Emperor was endeavouring to embroil the French affairs, Francis was forming new projects. He had good reason to be pleased with his glorious Campaign, which, in a short time, had regained him the Duchy of Milan. Mean while, Ferdinand's death inspiring him with fresh hopes, he formed the design of seizing the Kingdom of Naples, imagining, the new King of Spain would be unable to defend it, before he was thoroughly settled in his Kingdoms. Besides, he believed he had so attached the Pope to his Interests, by the Treaty of Bologna, that he did not doubt to find in him all the assistance necessary to his undertaking, looking upon him as his best Friend. But he did not know Leo X. That Pontiff did by no means desire, the French should become more powerful in Italy, and if he testified to the King, that he was in his Interests, it was only to prevent his opposing the projects he had himself formed in favour of his own House. The Emperor's Invasion of the Milanese this year, interrupted the execution of Francis's design upon Naples, and what afterwards happened, caused him to lay aside all thoughts of it. However, his desire to conquer that Kingdom occasioned a defensive League against him towards the end of the year, as will be related, after a word or two more of the Italian affairs.

Leo X. was no sooner reconciled with Francis I. than he deprived, upon a frivolous pretence, the Duke of Urbino of his Duchy, and invested Lorenzo de Medici, who assumed from thenceforward, the title of Duke of Urbino, and the old dispossessed Duke retired to Mantua.

It was in order to accomplish this design, that the Pope had flattered Francis with the hopes of assisting him in the Conquest of Naples. But after he was become master of Urbino, by that Monarch's Connivance, instead of thanking him for it, he thought only how to drive the French out of the Duchy of Milan. To that end, he secret Intelligence with the Emperor, the King of England, and the new King of Spain, and used his utmost endeavours, by the help of his Emiliaries, to persuade the Switzers to break their Alliance with France. Though he acted with all possible precaution, he could not treat so privately but that his secret practices came to the King's knowledge, who pretended however to be ignorant of them. On the contrary, he did all that lay in his power to gain the Pope in reality to his Interest, otherwise he was sensible his attempt upon Naples would never succeed. Leo X. desired nothing better than to amuse him, whilst he was secretly acting against him. But at length, Francis perceiving more and more his Infincerity, lost all thoughts of the Conquest of Naples, and resolved to treat with the 1516. tan Articles, desiring his approbation, for which he offered to come in person and pay him his respects. At that time the affairs of the rest of Europe having, as hath been said, taken a new turn, Henry agreed to prolong the Truce to the end of the year 1517.

These are the most considerable events which passed in the several States of Europe during the year 1516. I shall only add a word concerning the Council of Lateran, which still continued its Sessions without having much to do. As the Council meddled neither with the Reformation of the Church, though they seemed to be called for that very purpose, nor with the extirpation of Heresies, they resolved, in order to keep themselves employed, to reform the Calendar, which was become very faulty. To that end, the Pope causing memorandums to be drawn, undertook to write to all the Christian Princes, inviting them to send their best Astronomers to Rome, or at least order them to examine what had been proposed upon that subject. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the Brief addressed to Henry VIII, where the Pope says he had adjourned the next Session to December, to give the Mathematicians time to send in their opinions.

The Emperor having ratified the Treaty of Noyon as far as it concerned him, restored Verona to the Venetians, the 15th of January 1517, having received two hundred thousand Crowns, and an acquittance for what he owed the King of France. Moreover, to give the Arbitrators time to adjust the differences he still had with Venice, he agreed that the Truce should be prolonged for five years; but on condition that, during the Truce, the Venetians should pay him yearly twenty thousand Crowns. It was almost impossible to make a Treaty with him, and Money not accrue to him from it. Thus ended at length a War which may be deemed a consequence of the League of Cambray. The Venetians were engaged in it from the beginning to the end, and expended no less than five millions of Ducats of the publick Treasure, besides the infinite damages sustained by the Subjects.

Maximilian having thus desisted from his designs upon Italy, went into the Low-Countries to see his Grandson Charles before he departed for Spain. During his stay there, he concluded with him and the King of France a League against the Turks, wherein a place was reserved for the King of England. The Pope and the Council of Lateran earnestly pressed all the Princes of Christendom to join in this League, on pretence of the progress the Turks were making in Egypt against the Mamelucks (1), after which, he pretended, their design was to attack the Christians. But what followed shewed the Pope's sole view was to heap up Money for his own use, and to enrich his Family.

Mean while, Charles, the new King of Spain, thought only of speedily going to take possession of his Kingdoms. He had just made with Francis I. a Peace so advantageous to France, that he did not fear, that Prince would break it, because it would not be for his interest. So, when the English Ambassador pressed him to ratify the London League, he deferred it some time on divers pretences, because, deeming it needless, he was afraid of offending the King of France. He ratified it however after some alterations, and at length in August departed for Spain, where his presence was absolutely necessary. Upon his Arrival, he dismissed Cardinal Ximenes, who died with grief. After that, he so gave himself up to the Flemings, whom he had brought with him, that the Spaniards conceived such a jealousy as carried them afterwards to great extremities.

The Pope, as I have observed, continually amused Francis with the hopes of a strict Alliance with him, at the very time he was raising him Enemies on all sides. Francis was partly informed of his proceedings, but did not know all. So, in expectation of really attaching him in the end to his interests, he omitted nothing he thought capable of gaining him, even feigning to deem him his best Friend, when he most suspected him. But as the Pope knew in his conscience, he had not deserved Francis's Friendship, he could not believe his advances sincere. Mean while, it was for his interest that Francis should publicly appear to be his Friend, and therefore he kept very fair with him, and not without cause. In the beginning of the year 1517, Francisco Maria della Rovere, who had been dispossessed of the Duchy of Urbino, prepared to recover his Dominions. When by the Truce concluded between the Emperor and the Venetians, the Spanish Troops in the State of Venice were become useless, la Rovere found means to gain and employ them in his service. With these supplies he took Urbino, and carried terror into Tuscany and the Ecclesiastical State. Lorenzo de Medici, the new Duke of Urbino, or rather the Pope his Uncle, being then unable to recover that Duchy, he was forced to have recourse to the assistance of the Christian Princes, under colour that the Church was grievously oppressed, the interest of the House of the Medici being then the same with those of the Church. Francis I, who had the gaining of the Pope ever in view, made use of this opportunity to do him a signal service, in sending him a good Body of Troops, under the command of Lesclapart Brother of Laurac. This War however lasted seven or eight months, during which the Pope never ceased to press all the Christian Princes to contribute to the charges of a War, which, according to him, ought to have affected all the World. Henry VIII being solicited like the rest, refused to interpose. But the Pope found means to engage his Subjects, by levying a Tenth upon the Clergy, of which Cardinal Wolsey was appointed Collector. The War of Urbino ended in a way la Rovere did not expect. The Pope bribed the Spaniards in his Service, who came to an Agreement for him, which he was obliged to accept. Thus being once more constrained to relinquish his Dominions, he retired to Mantua.

Whilst the Pope was employed in the War of Urbino, he discovered a Plot against his Person, contrived by the Cardinal of Sienna, who had bribed a Surgeon to poison him. The Cardinal being absent from Rome when the discovery was made, the Pope, who passionately desired to have him in his power, scrupled not to use fraud to compass his ends. He sent him a Safe-Conduct, and moreover, promised the Spanish Ambassador that he would do him no hurt. The Cardinal being so weak as to come to Rome upon the faith of the Safe-Conduct, was immediately confined in the Castle of St. Angelo, and afterwards strangled in Prison. The Spanish Ambassador complained of this breach of faith; but was told by the Pope, a Safe-Conduct was never reckoned to extend to High-Treason, without express mention of the case. Some other Cardinals accused or suspected of being concerned in the Plot, were deposed, imprisoned, or severely fined.

Francis I never ceased courting the Pope to gain his Friendship, fearing that by his secret practices he would re-ignite the War, to deprive him of Milan. He imagined to have found at last an infallible means to attach him to his interests, in procuring Lorenzo de Medici a very advantageous marriage, with Magdalen Heiress of the House of Boulogne. This proposal was gladly accepted, and Lorenzo repairing to Paris for that purpose, stood Godfather in the Pope's name, to the French Dauphin, born the beginning of this year. In acknowledgment for the King's favour to Lorenzo, the Pope granted him Tents upon the Clergy, under colour of the War to be waged with the Turks. But he took care to assign fifty thousand Livres for the charges of the Wedding, which was to be solemnized at Paris.

The pretended War Christendom was to undertake against the Turks, seemed to the Pope to be a fair opportunity to enrich himself by the contributions of the Christians. To that end, he granted plenary Indulgences to all that would contribute, and caused them to be publicly sold at so moderate a price, that a Man must have been very careless of his Salvation not to purchase them. But it was this that made the Pope expect to reap an immense profit, for, probably, there would not be a Christian without them. Mean while, that the Money arising from the Sale might be regularly collected, all Christendom was parted into so many divisions, and in each were appointed Collectors to receive the Money, and Preachers to extol the Benefit of Indulgences (2). But,

(1) The Word Mameluck signifies in Syria, a hired Soldier. Jewish Lays, they were Circassian Slaves sold by the Tartars and Padishans to the Merchants, and being trained up at Cairo in military Exercises, were picked out for the Sultan's Guard, and preferred to the highest Posts, who in 1555 refused to obtain the Kingdom of Egypt for themselves. The Government was elective, and the Sea could claim no Inheritance but his Father's personal Estate. Every Mameluck, while Number in all ways about sixteen or eighteen thousand, had a Vote in the Election, and required a Gold Ducat of the Slave as soon as chosen. There were in all of this Race sixteen Kings, from the year before-mentioned, to the present year 1517, when Tamur II, their last King, was conquered in the first year of his Reign by Selimus I. Thus Egypt became a Province of the Turkish Empire, as it still continues. Hist. Rec. Guicciard.

(2) It had soon with thought and believed for a good while, that the Pope, out of the inexhaustible Treasure of the Church, arising from the Merits of Christ, and Words of Supererogation of the Saints, had a power of distributing Indulgences on certain Conditions prescribed by him, to the great Benefit of the Souls of Sinners for a penny Remission of Sin, (as it is practiced at this day in Portugal, &c.) These Indulgences are supposed as not to reach only to relaxation of Penances or Ecclesiastical Discipline. Urban II, in the beginning of the XIII Century, was the first that granted a full Remission of all Sins to those who should take up Arms for the recovery of the Holy-Land from the Infidels, which Custom was kept up by his Successors, some of whom extended the Benefit of their Indulgences to such Persons who were bent unwilling or unable to go, maintained a Soldier in their Town. At length these Spiritual Favours were distributed to those who took the Field against the Enemies of Holy Church or Heretics.

design, lest he should be taxed with not having a due regard for Religion. But they gave only Words, whereas the Pope wanted Deeds. Hence the Pope's project of an universal League had not, as will hereafter be seen, the Success he expected. However, the project, though chimerical, served for pretence and a cloak to many other designs. The Emperor, desiring to have one of his Grandsons chosen King of the Romans, used the pretence of the imaginary War Christendom was in danger of from the Turks, to show the necessity of continuing the Imperial Dignity in the House of Austria, there being no other in Germany, able by its own strength to withstand their Arms. Charles King of Spain made use of the same pretence for the same purpose. Besides that, as he wanted some years of Peace, he strenuously insisted upon the project of a general Truce, against the Turks. Francis I, plainly saw, by the defensive League made against him, that a pretence was only sought to invade him, and take away the Duchy of Milan. So, a general Truce could not but be advantageous to him in his present Circumstances. Besides, he had in view the recovery of Tour-nay, which could be accomplished but during a Peace. Henry VIII, knowing that the Pope, the Emperor, and the Kings of France and Spain had joined in a League against the Turks, was apprehensive that League covered some design against him. For that reason, he would not refuse to enter into the same engagement, for fear of giving them a pretence. Thus the chief Potentates of Europe being concerned to improve the Crusade, or at least, not to reject it, the lesser Powers were also obliged to follow the Torrent. This gave the Pope great hopes he should at last effect his designs. But as in truth, not one of the Princes thought the thing practicable, the project was still very far from being executed.

Negotiation about Tour-nay.

Whilst Leo X, fed himself with these hopes, Francis was thinking much more seriously of means to recover Tour-nay, than of the affairs of the Crusade. On the other hand, Cardinal Wolsey was afraid of losing the Administration of the Bishoprick, because he saw no likelihood of sowing discord between France and England, at a time when all the Princes of Europe showed a desire to live in Peace. He could not therefore keep the Administration, if Guillard, the true Bishop, would take the Oath to the King, to which he seemed inclined. This made him embrace the secret offers of Francis, to make him ample amends, if he could induce the King his master to restore that place to France. Francis was very sensible, that before all things the Cardinal was to be satisfied, not only in order to recover Tour-nay, but to procure it as cheap as possible. This was the subject of a private Negotiation between them, before Henry was informed of it. To succeed, Francis spared neither Flatteries nor Promises, nor Presents. If Polydore Virgil may be credited, these Presents were very considerable. But however, it was agreed between them, that the Cardinal should be recompensed for the loss of the Administration, with an annual Pension. That the King of France should give Henry six hundred thousand Crowns for Tour-nay. But as this Sum was a little too large, an Expedient, mentioned hereafter, was found to reduce it to a much less. Upon these two Conditions, the Cardinal undertook to obtain his master's Consent to the King of France's desires. One of less Assurance than the Cardinal, and not so secure of the King's Confidence, would doubtless, have been greatly embarrassed, since the Business was to convince the King of the contrary, to what hitherto he had been endeavouring to make him believe, namely, that Tour-nay was no longer necessary. When Francis I, would have treated of the restitution of Tour-nay, Wolsey had represented to the King, that both for his own and England's Interest, it was of very great consequence to keep that place, which was moreover a perpetual Monument of his Victories, whilst it should be in his hands. Now altering his Tone, he undertakes to persuade, and indeed does persuade him, that the place is of no use, and the maintenance of the Garrison far outweighs all the advantages he can receive from thence. That it was better to yield it to the King of France, who earnestly sued for it, and, to obtain it, scrupled not to condescend to make Presents to a Minister. That nothing could be more honorable for the King, than to see that Monarch make the first advances to procure his Friendship, and render it perpetual, by the marriage of the Dauphin with the Princess Mary, which also he proposed. That therefore the present opportunity should be improved to receive a good Sum of Money in lieu of Tour-nay, which being so remote from Calais, would infallibly be lost upon the first rupture between the two Crowns. That hereby the King of France would be obliged to be his Friend, and their Union would render them Umpires of Europe. That this Union was the more necessary, as it was time to think of opposing the growing power of the House of Austria, who possessing the Empire, Spain, the Low Countries, the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, were infallibly going to render themselves very formidable to all the Sovereigns. The strength of these reasons was too manifest for Henry to resist them. All he could think strange was, that the Cardinal had not sooner proposed them, but till then had rather used directly contrary arguments, to hinder the restitution of Tour-

nay. But, as it has been remarked, Wolsey had such an ascendent over him, that he could persuade him Pro and Con as he pleased (1).

Henry having agreed to what the Cardinal proposed, the next thing was to treat upon the matter. As soon as Francis I, was informed of it, he sent a solemn Ambassy to England, consisting of Admiral Bonivet, Stephen Puchet Bishop of Paris, and M. de Villars Secretary of State (2). For form's sake, some time must be spent in this Negotiation, though the King of France and the Cardinal had already agreed upon the chief Articles, by the mediation of Villars, who had been in London ever since the beginning of July, whereas his Colleagues arrived not till two months after. The French Ambassadors had full Powers to treat of the renewing of Friendship between the two Kings; of a League with the Pope and all Christian Princes who desired to be included in it, for the defence of Religion and the Church; of a Marriage between the Dauphin and the Princess Mary Daughter of Henry; of the Restitution of Tour-nay, St. Amant, and Montagne; and of an Interview of the two Kings. Moreover, they brought Francis's Letters Patents, whereby he promised to pay to his good Friend the Cardinal of Lork, an annual Pension of twelve thousand Livres, in consideration of his relinquishing the Administration of the Bishoprick of Tour-
nay. As the Treaties concluded upon these Articles were not ready till the beginning of October, I shall briefly mention another affair, transacted about the same time.

The Pope was ever intent upon the Business of the Crusade, from whence he hoped to draw great Sums. He writ last year to all Christian Princes, to notify the Victory of Saint Emperor of the Turks, over the Mamelukes of Egypt, whose Empire he had utterly destroyed. The beginning of this year, he called the College of Cardinals to send a Letter to Henry, representing to him, the danger Christendom was in, after the Victory by the Ottoman Emperor over the Sultan of Egypt, who, according to the best advice, was then in battle. The Cardinals exhorted the King to undertake the defence of Religion jointly with all the other Christian Sovereigns, with the Pope and sacred College, who were ready to sacrifice to that end, their own, as well as the Church's Treasure. The plain meaning of all this was, that the King ought to contribute largely towards the Crusade, his Country being too remote from Turkey to send Forces thither.

Some time after, the Pope sent Legates a Latere (3) to several Courts (4), with orders to exhort the Sovereigns to accept and preserve a five years Truce, enjoined by his Apostolick power. They were likewise to use their endeavours to persuade them to unite all their Forces, and make war upon the Turk. Cardinal Lomaxius Campius was appointed for England, and already departed from Rome in the beginning of May, to go and execute his Commission. But Wolsey deemed it a very great affront, that the Pope had not thought of him for this Legateship. So, whilst Campius was on the road, he sent a trusty Messenger to Rome, to represent to the Pope, that by showing so little regard for a Cardinal, actually in England, and the King's Prime Minister, he put it out of his power to do him any service: That whatever he should say to support what the Pope required, would be of no weight, since he should be considered as one whom the Court of Rome durst not trust with the Legateship: That it was rather the Pope's Interest to make use of him to obtain his desires, considering the Confidence the King had put in him with, and that, without his assistance, the project which would be in danger of miscarriage. Leo X, easily perceived by this representation that Wolsey, must be contented.

May 31.

So by a Bull of the 1st of May, he joined him with Campejus in the same Commission (1), giving them both an equal authority, knowing, (says he in the Bull directed to Wolsey) your great Credit with the King, and how easily you can persuade or dissuade him. Mean while, Campejus arriving at Boulogne, Wolsey found means to detain him there till he had received the Pope's answer.

For which reason it was the 29th of July before the Italian Legate made his Entry into London. As he had but a very poor train, Wolsey sent him twelve Mules with Coffers richly covered. But some of these Coffers happening to fall, during the Procession, and being overturned and broken, were found to be empty (2), to the great Sport and Laughter of the people, who derided this external Pageantry. There is in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a Bull of Leo X, with extraordinary powers to the two Legates, authorizing them to grant a plenary Indulgence to the faithful of both Sexes, who should be present at the Mass, which either of the Legates should celebrate in the presence of the King and Queen, or at least at the Benediction, provided they confessed their Sins, or desired to confess, and were penitent.

Ad. Pub.
XIII p. 609.

The Legates Commission consisted of two points. The first was, to try to obtain of the Clergy an Aid of Money for the War against the Turk. But the Clergy stood their ground against all their attempts. The second was, to persuade Henry to join in the projected League with all the Christian Princes for the defence of Religion and the Church. The Pope's design was not to undertake a War against the Turk, but only to heap up Money on that pretence. Thus the League he was meditating, was likely to make the world believe he really intended to war against the Infidels. After which, he had a very plausible excuse to lay Impositions upon all the Clergy, and draw Money from the Sovereigns, and their Subjects, to bear the Charges of this pretended war. With this League therefore he was to begin, and upon that the Legates were commissioned to treat with the King, who seemed inclined to agree to it, though he might easily foresee the League would signify nothing.

The Legates Commission.

As Cardinal Wolsey's Credit increased in England, it became likewise greater at the Court of Rome. He had caused, as was before observed, Cardinal Adrian de Corneto to be removed from the Office of the Pope's Collector in England. But this slight punishment not sufficing to satisfy his revenge, he had so ordered it, that the King writ to the Pope, desiring him to deprive Adrian of the Cardinalate, and of the Bishoprick of Bath and Wells, which had been conferred on him. Leo X could not help thinking it very strange, that the King should make such a request, without alledging any reason. However, without giving him a positive denial, he contented himself with saying, he would give him satisfaction at a more proper Season. In 1517, there was a Conspiracy against the Pope, wherein Cardinal Adrian being concerned, was committed to Prison. Guicciardini informs, he was never more heard of, and that it is not known what became of him (3). But there is in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a Letter of Cardinal Julius de Medici, dated the 5th of July 1518, notifying to the King, that in a Consistory held that day, Cardinal Adrian was deposed and stripped of all his Preterments, inflicting withal to the King, that it was on his account. But it is more probable, he was punished for his Crime against the Pope. However this be, a few days after, the Pope gave Cardinal Wolsey the Administration of the Bishoprick of Bath and Wells, supposing he wanted it to maintain the Dignity of Cardinal.

Cardinal
Adrian de Corneto.

The Negotiation of the two Cardinals proceeded very slowly, since it was not sufficient to incline Henry to the League, but the rest of the Sovereigns were also to give their consent. Accordingly, the Pope solicited to the utmost of his power all the Potentates, magnifying the danger to which the Christian Religion was going to be infallibly exposed. In short, every Prince returning him the same answer, namely, that it was necessary all the Sovereigns should unite in this affair, he sent a Bull to his Legates in England, empowering them to conclude between the Emperor, and the Kings of France and Spain, a League against the Turk. His intent was, that the League should be offensive, else it would be of no advantage to him, unless the Turks should invade Christendom, which was hitherto thought to be very uncertain. But Leo was too well known, for the Princes to be thus taken in a Snare which tended only to render the Pope master of their own, and their people's Money. So, pretending zealously to enter into his project, they contented themselves with exhibiting their respective Leagues for the protection of the Pope, the Holy See, and their respective Dominions, and all Italy, and particularly against the Emperor of the Turks. The Pope was declared Head of the League, provided he justified it within such a time. But, the Princes made no mention of what each of the Allies was to furnish. At which shows, this League, according to the Intention of the Parties, was only to cast a mist before people's eyes, to give the Pope some satisfaction, and perhaps to signify the Turks.

This was not what the Pope desired. He could have wished, all the Princes of Christendom had joined together in an offensive League against the Turk, and engaged to defend their Forces to Constantinople, to attack the German Emperor in his Metropolis. In that case, he knew, the most remote would have been easily induced to furnish their quota in Money. Since the Practice Leonor Crufadas was over, the Pope had left no occasion to rekindle the same zeal, which had formerly procured so many advantages to their Possessions. But the Princes as well as the Princes were entirely dissuaded, because it was too visible that the Crufadas had been profitable to none but the Pope. So, for once, the Christian Princes were contented to make a defensive League, to show only, they were ready to defend Christendom against the attacks of the Infidels, desirous to take other measures till they should be obliged. Leo X seeing he could obtain no more, approved and ratified the League the 1st of December, after which it was never more mentioned. All the terrible preparations of the Turks to fall upon the Christians, as was affirmed, entirely vanished, as soon as the Pope found, his Artifices could not produce the effect he expected.

Whilst these things were in agitation, Cardinal Wolsey, jointly with the French Ambassadors, was employed in preparing the Treaties, agreed upon, to be signed.

London
France and England.

The first related to the marriage between the Prince Mary and the Dauphin, which was to be solemnized as soon as the young Prince should be full fourteen years old, each of the two Kings promising to pay five hundred thousand Crowns, in case it was his fault that the Marriage was not completed. Mary's Dowry was to be three hundred thirty three thousand Crowns of Gold, one half to be paid on the day of Marriage, and the other within a year after. The jointure was to be as great as had ever been assigned to any Queen of France, and particularly to Ann of Bretagne, and Mary of England, Wives to Lewis XII.

The second Treaty was upon the restitution of Tournay, a Treaty for which Francis I, engaged to pay Henry six hundred thousand Crowns of thirty-five-pence Tournais each, he paid fifty thousand Livres Tournais due to him from the Inhabitants (4). But out of these two sums Francis was to keep back the Princess Mary's Dowry. As to the payments, he obliged himself to pay fifty thousand Livres upon taking possession of the place, and then twenty-five thousand Livres every six months till the whole sum was paid (5).

The third Treaty concerned the Outrages which might be committed for the future against the Peace, by the Subjects of either King, and contained certain regulations to procure speedy reparation.

By the fourth, the two Monarchs agreed upon an interview in the Village of Sandinfels, between Adrian and Guiljnes.

These Treaties being signed the 14th of October, the French Ambassadors gave Cardinal Wolsey their Master's Letters Patents, whereby he bound himself to pay him an annual Pension of twelve thousand Livres Tournais, to satisfy him for the loss of the Bishoprick of Tournay.

Europe enjoyed then a profound Tranquillity. But upon the death of the Emperor Maximilian (3), the 12th of January 1519, new troubles arose. By his death, France, Spain, Italy, Germany, England, Scotland, the Low-Countries, were engaged in Wars no less fatal to them than the former. As soon as Maximilian was in his Grave, the Kings of France and Spain openly declared themselves Candidates for the Empire, and began to cabal among the Electors to obtain their desires. This threw the Electors into great perplexity. On which side soever they turned, they saw for themselves, for Germany, for all Europe, advantages and inconveniencies which deserved their whole attention. It would have been the interest of Germany to keep the balance even between the two Monarchs who aspired to the imperial dignity, and to reject both. But by chusing one of the Competitors, such superiority would be given him as could not but be fatal to all Europe, and particularly to Germany. I shall not farther insist upon the reasons which the Electors had to chuse one or reject both. It is well known, on these occasions, the publick good does not always serve for rule and foundation to form decisions of this nature.

The Pope's Interests.

Leo X wished, as it was indeed his interest, the Electors would agree to chuse one of their own Body. Charles being possessed of the Kingdom of Naples, and Francis of the Duchy of Milan, the election of one of these Monarchs could not but one day disturb the peace of Italy, and prove destructive to the papal power. Accordingly the Pope used his utmost endeavours to perfwade the Electors to take that course. But however, he was forced to act privately for fear of making the two Candidates his Enemies, by openly declaring against them.

Death of Lorenzo de Medici.
Guicciard.

Whilst the resolution of the Electors was impatiently expected, Lorenzo de Medici the Pope's Nephew, was seized with a distemper that laid him in his Grave. By this unexpected accident, that branch of the Family of Medici was reduced to the Person of the Pope, sole lawful descendent of Cosmo the Great, who first acquired the Sovereignty of Florence. Some endeavours were used to perfwade the Pope to restore his Country to liberty; but he did not love the Florentines well enough to suffer them to enjoy so valuable a blessing, of which he had taken so much pains to deprive them. Resolving therefore to keep that State, he sent Cardinal Julius de Medici natural Son of Julian his Uncle, to govern in his name. Shortly after, he annexed the Duchy of Urbino to the Church, and razed the Walls of the Capital, for fear the Romans should think of recovering it.

The Electors being assembled to proceed to the Election of an Emperor, Francis and Charles sent Ambassadors to the Assembly to manage their concerns. The Pope would have a Nuncio there too, who had orders privately to endeavour to cause them both to be rejected; but however, to conform himself outwardly to the disposition of the Electors. Henry VIII perceiving the difficulties which would occur in the choice of either of the Candidates, sent Richard Pace to the Diet to try whether there was any thing to be expected for him. But as he thought of it too late, his Ambassador found the affair too advanced, that he did not think fit to expose the King's honour. He writ to him therefore, that indeed some of the Electors (4) showed an inclination to favour him: That the Pope would have likewise supported him to the utmost of his power, had he declared sooner; but that matters were so ordered; that the Election would infallibly be over before proper measures could be taken to accomplish his project. And indeed, a few days after, on the 28th of June, Charles King of Spain was declared Emperor, by the name of Charles V, or rather of Charles Quint, as he was then, and still is called to this day (5).

of Europe.
But though these two Monarchs looked upon each other with a jealous and envious Eye, and wanted not the pretences for a War, neither of them durst however begin before he had founded the rest of the Sovereigns. And how they stood affected will also be necessary to know, for the better understanding the Sequel, the interests of Princes giving to History a perpetuity, which without that assistance is sought for in vain.

Leo X was equally afraid of the two Monarchs, being of Leo X.
fensible, to which side soever the Balance inclined, Italy must be in danger. If he could have set them at variance without making Italy the seat of the War, he would freely have done it. But that was not possible. Much less was it in his power to stand Neutral. The reason is, because he could not hinder the contents about Naples and Milan from being decided by Arms, and therefore could not avoid interposing in a quarrel, which would so nearly concern him. He took therefore the course which best agreed with his temper, and that was to be reserved and manage both the Monarchs, till he found it his interest to declare himself. But through all his disguises, he discovered however some partiality to the Emperor, in the grant of a dispensation to hold the Empire with the Kingdom of Naples, though that was directly contrary to the Terms on which he had given him the investiture of that Kingdom. Francis complained of it, but the Pope excused it as not having in his power to refuse, without involving himself in troubles from which it would not have been easy for him to be delivered.

As for Henry VIII, the posture of affairs between Of Henry Charles and Francis might have rendered his Reign very glorious, had he not entirely given himself up to the interested Counsels of Cardinal Wolsey. He had it in his

(2) This year was instituted the College of Physicians in London. King Henry's Charter for that purpose bears date October 23. The Physicians named in the Charter, are, Juan Chamber, Thomas Linacre, Bernard de Vitoria, Nicolas Hulsewell, John Francis, and Robert Taxley. Rymer's Fed. Tom. 13. p. 614.

(3) He was King of the Romans, and called Emperor, though never crowned by that Title. Some say, the reason was because he declined the Charge and Burden of going into Italy to receive the Imperial Crown at the Pope's hands. He spent his leisure hours in Poetry, writing the History of his Life in Dutch Verse. As Knight of the Garter, his Obsequy was solemnly kept in St. Paul's, by our King and the Knights of that Order. Hist. p. 33.

(4) The Electors of Mentz, Cologne, and Trier, stood so affected, that Pace thought if our King had put in sooner, he would have carried it. Hist. p. 33.

(5) Instead of spending his Money in bribing the Electors, as Francis did, particularly the Marquis of Brandenburg, he laid it out in raising numerous Force, which he brought to Transfert. Whereupon the Majority of the Electors (viz. the Archbishops of Mentz and Cologne, the Count Palatine, and the Duke of Saxony,) being thereby terrified and over-awed, agreed to chuse him. There were then but seven Electors, which, together with the four just now mentioned, were the Archbishops of Treves or Trier, the Marquis of Brandenburg, and the King of Bohemia. This was an opportunity which a person so fond of pageantry and ostentation could not neglect.

Affairs of Spain.

The Emperor had reason to care for Cardinal Wolsey. He had met in Spain with unexpected difficulties. The Castilians and Aragonians were bent to preserve their Privileges, which were continually attacked by the Emperor's Flemish Counsellors. On the other hand, the Emperor, on pretence of the Crisade published by the Pope, having demanded a Tenth of the Clergy, that demand had caused throughout Spain Troubles which very much embarrassed that Prince. There had been also an Insurrection in which was not

The Emperor

Austria

appeased without difficulty.

In short, the King of France was privately labouring to raise the Emperor troubles in Naples, Sicily, Navarre, and to withdraw his Allies from him. All this made Henry's Friendship so necessary to him, that it is no wonder he should endeavour to win the Cardinal to his side, since the Minister's Credit was the only way to gain the master. The King of France used the same method, which exceedingly increased the Cardinal's pride; who seeing himself courted by these two Monarchs, had it in his power, if I may so say, to set what price he pleased upon his Services.

Whilst all the World was impatiently expecting the effect of the Jealousy between the Emperor and King of France, the affairs of Scotland still remained in the same situation, that is, in extreme disorder because of the Regent's absence. When he went from Scotland he hoped to return in few Months, but was not suffered to follow his Inclination. Francis I, foreseeing the want he might have of England, had made a private Treaty with Henry, promising to detain the Duke of Albany in France.

Thus Henry obtained by another way, what the Parliament of Scotland had plainly refused him. It was very easy to conceive, why he opposed the Duke of Albany's return. His design was to throw Scotland into trouble and confusion, to have an opportunity to interpose in the affairs of that Kingdom, under colour of supporting the Interests of the young King his Nephew. He could not therefore execute it better, than by fomenting Discord among the Nobility, which the Regent's preference might have remediated. But the War which afterwards broke out between

Charles and Francis, and wherein he was but too much concerned, prevented the prosecution of his designs against

Scotland. Probably this saved the Kingdom, which otherwise was in great danger of being conquered by the English.

Before I close the year 1519, I must not forget to remark, that this year the Emperor received the news of the discovery, and beginning of the Conquest of Mexico and

New-Spain. The mention of this particular is the more necessary, though it seems foreign to our History, as it was the Gold and Silver wherewith the new World furnished Spain, that contributed most to render Charles V

so powerful as he will hereafter appear. Besides, Money growing more plenty, by the Trade carried on by other Countries with Spain, the Reader must not be surprized to find hereafter more numerous Armies, greater magnificence in Princes Courts, and the Dowries of Princesses much larger than before. But Spain first improved the Gold and Silver of the new World, and was thereby enabled, in the Reigns of Charles Vth, and Philip II, to aspire to Universal Monarchy (1).

The Confidence placed by Francis I in Cardinal Wolsey, in giving him power to regulate his Interview with

Henry, would have been very honourable for that Minister, if, on the other hand, this proceeding had not shewn his little esteem for him, as believing him liable to Corruption. Be this as it will, Wolsey, by virtue of Powers received from the two Kings, made the 12th of March

1520, a Regulation, importing, among other things, "that the Interview should be on the 4th of June (2) between Ardes and Guisnes; That the King of England should go towards Ardes, as far as conveniently

he could (3), without passing however the English Pale,

"and the King of France should meet him at the place
"where he should stop." Henry, who had ordered it, that Francis paid the first Visit to Henry. But he assigned for reason, that the King his master having crossed the Seas, on purpose to do his Friend honour, it was very just, Francis should in some measure make him amends, by advancing, to receive him, a little beyond the Limits of his own Territories in some open place appointed by Deputies on either side. The rest of the regulation concerned the safety of the two Monarchs, their Queens, the Queen Dowager of France, Sister of Henry, Louisa of Savoy Dachefs of Angoulême, Mother to Francis I, the Traitors of the Princes and Princesses who were to assist at the Interview, the place where the two Kings were to meet and confer together, and lastly, the Diversions which the two Courts were to take.

During the time between the Regulation and the Interview, Francis caused the Cardinal to be founded, to know whether, by his means, he could not prevail with Henry to restore Calais for a Sum of Money. This proposal was, doubtless, attended with secret promises to the Cardinal, answerable to go great a Service, since he did not think fit to reject it. He durst not however speak of it directly to the King; but tried to manage, that others should inspire him with the thought, that in case the King advised with him upon it, he might give his opinion more freely. To that end, in his Conversation he would frequently turn the Discourse upon Calais, and say, as it was accidentally, What have we to do with this Calais, that lies on the Continent and costs us so much? It were to be wished we were wholly rid of it! This artifice failing, he never ventured to make the King to extraordinary a proposal, and the rather as, being resolved to engage with the Emperor, he was not so desirous to oblige the King of France.

The time of the Interview approaching, Henry (4) came to Canterbury the 25th of May, in order to pass his Whit- sonday there, and then proceed to Calais. But next day the news was brought him, that the Emperor was landed at Dover. This arrival surprized the whole Court, and perhaps the King himself. But the Cardinal had no reason to be surprized, since the Emperor had the 29th of March last, promised by Letters Patents dated from Crispignella, to give or cause to be given him by the Pope, the Bishoprick of Badajoz (5), within two months after the Conference he was to have in person with the King of England, as appears in the Collection of the Public Acts. Hence it is plain, the Emperor's Journey to England had been resolved ever since March, at least between the Emperor and the Cardinal. But it is uncertain whether the King was informed of it. However this be, the Cardinal was commissioned to go and welcome the Emperor at Dover, where the King came also on the morrow. Then the two Monarchs went together to Canterbury, where Henry sent for his Queen, who was extremely glad to see her Nephew the Emperor, having never seen him before (6).
The Emperor's aim in this visit was to dissuade the King from the Interview with Francis; but he could not succeed, Henry making him sensible, he could not recede with honour. But very likely he had also in view, the securing of Cardinal Wolsey, in order to gain, by his means, the King to his Interest. It is the common opinion, his Journey was not fruitless, but that he could obtain the Cardinal's favour, only by promising to die all his Credit to raise him to the Papacy, in case Leo X died before him.
Though the Emperor had not obtained all his desires, he departed however very well satisfied with his visit. Henry having promised not to enter into any Engagement with the King of France to his prejudice (7). On the 30th of Hall May, Charles proceeded to Flanders, and Henry to Calais (8).

I shall not stay to describe the Interview of the two Monarchs between Ardes and Guisnes, as regulated by the Cardinal. Whilst it lasted, there was nothing but Entertainments, Tournaments, Balls, Maquerades, and other Diversions, wherein the two Courts mixed to their mutual satisfaction. Every thing on both sides was so magnificent, that the Assembly was called, the Camp of the Cloth of Gold (9). But amidst all the pleasures which

In a word, he imagined to have reason to expect that the Pope, with whom he was in Treaty for the Conquest of Naples, instead of helping to increase the Emperor's power, would use his utmost endeavours to humble a Neighbour, who could not but be a terror to him. All this was strengthened with Francis's Alliances with the Venetians and Swissers, who joining with the Pope and the King of England, would of course render him superior to his Enemy, whose Kingdoms remote from each other, were less capable of giving mutual assistance. Thus Francis, flattered by these appearances, formed extraordinary projects suitable to his Ambition and Age, being then but twenty seven years old.

Of Charles V. As for Charles V., he had not yet done any thing to give a very advantageous Idea of him. His youth had been spent under the Guardianship of the Emperor Maximilian his Grandfather, or of Margaret of Austria his Aunt, and since he had assumed the Administration of the Low-Countries, his Governor Chievres did all in the name of the Prince. His first proceedings, after the death of King Ferdinand, begot no great opinion of him, for he had scarce set foot in Spain, before the Country was all in commotion. His advancement to the Empire was owing, perhaps, to the little esteem the World had for him. However, he was then the most potent Prince in Europe. Besides the imperial Dignity, he possessed all Spain, the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the Low-Countries, the Archduchy of Austria, and many other Provinces and Lordships in Germany. So, with his own Forces alone, he was able to withstand Francis I., assisted by all his Allies. Henry VIII. was the only Sovereign that had at first embarrassed him, by reason of his Union with France. But he had artfully drawn that Thorn out of his side, by means of Cardinal Wolsey. With this he began, as I may say, to discover his Ability, which till then had been as it were concealed. After that, he diligently applied himself to gain the Pope, and succeeded to his wish. Thus at the time I am now speaking of, he was become very formidable not only by his Forces, but also by the proofs he had given of his Capacity. As soon as he was raised to the Empire, he rightly judged he should find in Francis I., an Enemy that would spare nothing to make him feel the effect of his envy. For that reason he thought early of means to screen himself from his attempts, not only by a just defence, but even by attacking him first. He had two plausible reasons: One was, that the Crown of France withheld from him the Duchy of Burgundy, since the death of his Great Grandfather Charles the last Duke of Burgundy. The other concerned the Duchy of Milan, whereof Francis ought to have received the Investiture from the Emperor, since it was a Fief of the Empire, and yet he had never vouchsafed to ask it. He believed moreover to have cause of complaint for Francis's extorting from him the Treaty of Noyon as was before related.

In vain therefore do the Historians of both sides strive to cast the blame of the Rupture upon one or other of the two Monarchs. It is certain, both thought at the same time of making War, and took measures beforehand to execute their designs, though each privately endeavoured to engage his Rival in something that should make him be deemed the Aggressor. So, as the beginning of a Rupture is not to be judged of by the first Act of Hostility, but rather by the Cause, one can hardly be mistaken in affirming Charles V. and Francis I., to be equally Authors of a War which let all Europe in a flame. Charles was not above one and twenty years of Age, but of a very different Character from that of his Enemy. Francis was too much addicted to his Pleasures, whereas Charles was too intent upon his affairs, having been used to it from his youth. Francis was of a free and open Temper, but Charles was much more reserved. He maturely thought of what he had to say or do, and readily made use of artifice and evasion to accomplish his ends, framing his conduct by that of Maximilian and Ferdinand his Grandfathers.

Of Leo X. Leo X. had reason to be satisfied with his lot, could he have resolved to live in quiet. He was absolute master of the whole Ecclesiastical State, to which he had lately added all la Romagna, Modena, Reggio, and the Duchy of Urbino. His own, the Church's, and all Italy's grand Interest, was therefore to endeavour by all sorts of means to keep the Balance even between the Emperor and King of France, and to manage so, that neither of these two Monarchs should become too powerful in Italy. This was very practicable, since his Dominions being situated between those belonging to these two Princes in Italy, they 1521. necessarily wanted him, in order to invade Naples or Milan. Thus, by keeping a strict Neutrality, he would have probably freed Italy from a War, and preferred the papal Power in its full Lustre. But he was of too active a Spirit to remain in Peace. As he had a great opinion of his address, he ventured to engage in all sorts of affairs, how difficult soever they appeared, because, let what would be the event, he hoped to get clear by some artifice. Besides, he had this in common with all the Popes his Predecessors, that the respect for his Character removed his fear of being reduced to extremities, in case his undertakings were not crowned with success. As to the rest, he was entirely addicted to his Pleasures, spending most of his time with Musicians and Buffoons, and in some still less innocent Diversions. This, added to his liberal Temper, threw him into such excessive expences, that he was poor amidst his vast incomes, and always contriving means to procure Money. Hence his extraordinary Zeal to form a League against the Turks, because it afforded him a pretence to levy Tenth upon the Clergy, and sell his Indulgences to the great scandal of all Christendom (1).

Had this Pope been of a more narrow genius, he would have doubtless maintained the Tranquillity of Italy. But as he found himself capable of forming and executing great designs, he had a mind to render his Pontificate illustrious by some signal actions. Unfortunately for him and his Successors, he resolved to drive the French, Spaniards and Germans out of Italy, a project which may well be deemed extravagant. To accomplish it, he was necessarily to make use of the one to ruin the others, and by thus causing the Balance to incline all to one side he could not but give Matters to himself and all Italy, which he would have avoided by standing Neutral. But what chiefly engaged him in this project, was his desire to seize the Duchy of Ferrara, and recover Parma and Placentia, which he could not hope to effect, whilst the French were possessed of the Duchy of Milan. On the other hand, he was something uneasy with respect to Florence. He could not help fearing that Francis would think of restoring the Florentines to their ancient Liberty. He resolved therefore to begin with the French; but took care not to discover his designs. On the contrary, he continued private Negotiations with the King of France as well as with the Emperor, and put both equally in hopes of his Friendship. Mean while, as his intent was always to remain in this medium, he ordered six thousand Men to be levied in Switzerland, and sent for them into the Ecclesiastical State, having demanded a Passage through the Milanese, under colour of providing for the defence of his Towns.

Henry VIII. was then more advantageously situated than any King of England had ever been before him. He was at Peace with all Europe except Scotland, which would have been glad to be left in quiet. Though he had now consumed all the Money found in the King his Father's Coffers, he was however assured of being always supplied, since he was in a good understanding with his Parliament, and had the art of managing the two Houses with a very singular address. Thus being able to raise numerous Forces, and at liberty to turn them which way he pleased, it was doubtless in his Power to render himself Umpire of Europe. For that reason Charles and Francis with equal ardor courted his Friendship, being sensible, he could invincibly obstruct their designs, and cause the Balance to lean to the side he should please to espouse. It was his interest to keep always in this Situation, till obliged to interpose in their differences, to hinder the one from rising to the prejudice of the other. And indeed this was his aim and intention. But unfortunately for him, his weakness for his Prime Minister the Cardinal was beyond all imagination. This Favorite had such an ascendancy over him, that he inclined him which way he pleased, always under the specious colour of carrying his Glory to a greater height, though in reality he had only his own Interests in view. We have already seen sensible proofs of his great influence over his Master, in what passed during and after the late War with France. He had persuaded him to deliver to the Emperor Maximilian the City of Tournonne, which might have been of great Service to him, and to keep Tournay, which was of little or no advantage. Afterwards, when he was in possession of the Bishoprick of Tournay, he had artfully persuaded him that the keeping of that place would be an everlasting Monument of his Glory. But when he saw, he was like to lose the Bishoprick, and had ample amends offered him, he found other reasons to convince him that he ought to part with a place which was of no benefit to him. We shall see 1521. presently that he led him also to make a very false step in espousing the Emperor's part against France, whereas his true interest was to keep the balance even between these two Potentates. All this was done for the sake of Cardinal Wolsey, who having the ambition to aspire to the Papedom, thought to succeed by the Emperor's means. The Pension procured him by Charles upon the Bishoprick of Palencia in Castile, and the Administration of the See of Badajoz, at a time when he had not yet received any publick Service from him, are incontestable proofs that the Cardinal had engaged with him, as being sure of governing his Master as he pleased. These things afforded no very advantageous Idea of Henry's penetration.

(1) This is the Pope of whom Rembo his Secretary reports this saying: It has been long and well known how desirous the King of France was to be the Successor of his Predecessors.

Such were the Characters, Interests, and Designs of the four principal Sovereigns concerned in the new War I am going to speak of. The King of Scotland was yet too young to be reckoned among the Directors of the affairs of Europe. The Venetians fought only to live in Peace, being, as I may say, exhausted by the former War. However they could not avoid entering into this also. As for the Swissers, they were satisfied with their Pensions from France, and generally inclined to observe the Articles of their Alliance with that Crown. But they were not entirely secured from the secret practices continued by the Pope's and the Emperor's Agents with some of their Magistrates, to try to persuade them not to take part with France.

Francis I. having formed a design to make War upon the Emperor, without incurring the blame of the rupture, resolved to begin with what could not be imputed to him as a premeditated design to quarrel. By the Treaty of Noyon, Charles was bound to resign Navarre to Henry d'Albret within four months, in default whereof, Francis was free to assist Henry to recover his Kingdom. The affairs of Spain being extremely embroiled since the Emperor quitted that Country, Francis believed it a fair opportunity to invade Navarre. He was the more inclined to this undertaking, as the two Regents of Spain had been forced to draw Troops from Pamplona and other Places of that Kingdom, to reinforce the Army which was to act against the fore-mentioned League. He sent therefore into Navarre, in the beginning of March, an Army under the command of Lefgarrie of the House of Foix, elder Brother of Lautrec and Lescun. This General finding the Kingdom without Troops and almost deserted, became master of it in the space of a fortnight. Had he stopped there, perhaps Navarre would have been still at this day annexed in deed, and in name only, to the Crown of France, since the Spaniards were unable to expel Henry d'Albret, from whom the Kings of France of the House of Bourbon are descended. But the desire of acquiring fame, or procuring the King's advantage, carried Lefgarrie to enter the Province of Guipuzcoa, and besiege Logroño. The Regents of Spain had no thoughts of recovering Navarre. But when they saw the French invading Spain it self, they assembled their Forces to stop their Progress. The Malecontents themselves lately vanquished, accepting a General Pardon, led all their Troops to the Regents. Lefgarrie seeing an Army, much stronger than his, coming against him, would have retired; but was so closely pursued that he was forced to come to a Battle, wherein he was defeated and taken Prisoner. The loss of this Battle occasioned the loss of Navarre, which the Spaniards recovered in less time than the French had conquered it. Thus the King of France had the mortification to lose his Army to no purpose, and flagrantly discover to the Emperor how he stood affected towards him.

The same time that he invaded Navarre, he raised Charles an Enemy from another Quarter; namely Robert de la Mark Prince of Sedan and Sovereign of Baillon, who believing to have cause to complain of the Emperor, for a denial of justice to the young Princes of Chimay (1), whose Guardian he was, implored the King of France's Protection. Very probably, Francis had offered it before it was desired. However, Robert de la Mark, seeing himself supported by the King, was so bold as to send a defiance to the Emperor, who was then at the Diet of Worms. Shortly after, the Earl of Fleuranges, eldest Son of la Mark, put himself at the head of four or five thousand Men (2) levied in France, and besieged Vireton a Place in Luxemburg belonging to the Emperor.

Then it was that Charles, who had with reluctance agreed to the League of London, thought proper however to make use of it in summoning the King of England to assist him, as obliged by the Treaty, since it was evident, the King of France had raised him 'this Enemy.' Henry, prepossessed by the Cardinal, was glad of a pretence to cast the blame of the Rupture upon the French King. Mean while, to proceed according to the Articles of the League, he sent an Ambassador to require him to forbear all Hostility against the Emperor, not only in Luxemburg but also in Navarre. Francis replied, he was not Author of the War between Robert de la Mark and the Emperor, and all he could do was to forbid his Subjects to serve or assist la Mark. As to Navarre, it would have been needless to answer, since it was now out of his power to re-enter it. He performed his promise with regard to the War of Luxemburg, and Fleuranges disbanded his Army. Francis took care not openly to support the Duke of Bouillon, for fear of affording Henry, who had offered his mediation, a pretence to declare for the Emperor. I shall pursue this affair, when I have spoken of those of Italy, which are of no less importance.

In the beginning of this, or perhaps before the end of the last year, Leo X. concluded with the French Ambassador residing at Rome, a Treaty whereby he joined in a League with Francis for the Conquest of Naples. The Treaty ran, that all that part of the Kingdom of Naples lying between the Ecclesiastical State and Gariglian should remain to the Pope: And the rest should be for Henry the King's second Son; but during his Minority, the Kingdom should be governed by the Pope's Legate, who should reside at the City of Naples. Whatever the Pope's intention was in making this Treaty, it may be almost affirmed, he acted with insincerity, because it must have been very disadvantageous to him for the same Prince to hold Milan and Naples. He was too politic, and too much used to by ways, to be thought to proceed fairly on this occasion. What may most probably be conjectured is, that his intention was to deal by Francis I. as Ferdinand King of Arragon had done by Lewis XII, when he made much the same partition with that Prince. At least Francis, who had frequently experienced what the Pope was capable of, could never believe he really intended to assist him in that Conquest. Wherefore he delayed the ratification of the Treaty, to gain time to consider seriously of the affair.

Leo X. finding the time for ratifying the Treaty was expired, suspected the King of proceeding with the Emperor some agreement prejudicial to the Holy See. Those that deal not sincerely, are ready to think others like themselves. However, the King of France's affected delays afforded the Pope a motive or pretence to conclude another Treaty with the Emperor, to drive the French out of the Milanese, and restore the Sforza's. As he continued at once secret Negotiations with the Emperor and the King of France, it would be something difficult to know his real design, if there was not a notable difference between the two Treaties just mentioned. That with the French Ambassador concerned a chimerical project, the execution whereof was almost impracticable in the present juncture of affairs, and besides, really contrary to his true interest; whereas the other was to his advantage, and agreeable to the projects he had formed. So, probably, the first was made only to procure better Terms from the Emperor. Besides, he had been ever wont to have, as they say, two strings to his Bow, which he considered as the grand Mystery of Politicks. His Treaty with the Emperor was no less advantageous, than that he would have made with the King of France. The chief Articles were these.

That the Pope and Emperor should join their Forces to expel the French out of the Milanese, and restore Francesco Sforza. That Prince was then at Trent, having retired thither, a little before his Brother Maximilian was dispossessed of his Dominions.

That Parma and Placentia should be restored to the Church.

That the Inhabitants of the Milanese should provide themselves with Salt only at Gervia, a Town in the Ecclesiastical State.

That the Emperor should aid the Pope to conquer Ferrara.

That the sum the Emperor gave the Pope for the Kingdom of Naples should be augmented.

That the Emperor should protect the Family of Medici.

That he should grant to the Cardinal de Medici a Pension of ten thousand Ducats, upon the Archbishoprick of Toledo.

That Alexander de Medici, natural Son to Lorenzo late Duke of Urbino, should have in the Kingdom of

This Treaty was kept so private that it came not to Francis's Knowledge, till the two Allies were going to invade the Milanese. Mean while they concerted proper measures to accomplish their designs. The Pope who had already fix thousand Switzers in his Service, took care to augment his Forces on divers pretences. The Emperor ordered the Viceroy of Naples, to keep the Troops of that Kingdom ready to march upon the first notice, and at the same time caused Levies to be made in Germany, to reinforce his Army in Italy. Prosper Colonna was declared General of the League.

While Francis continued in a fatal security, and left the Milanese destitute of Troops, never imagining he should be attacked in Italy, because he thought himself sure of the Pope, the two new Allies were contriving to seize at once, Milan, Genoa, and Como, before they proclaimed War against him. For the first of these projects they employed Hieronimo Morena Senator of Milan, who being suspected by the French, was banished the City. Morena having assembled a great number of Exiles (i) in the Neighbourhood of Milan; Lekun, who commanded in the absence of his Brother Lautrec, the Governor, fell out of Milan with some Troops, and pursued the Exiles to Reggio, a Town of the Pope's, where they had retired, and even demanded of the Governor to deliver them into his hands. The Governor refusing, Lekun withdrew, and posted himself about ten Miles from Reggio, within the Pope's Territories, and lay encamped ten or twelve days. Then the Pope, who only wanted a pretence to declare against France, called a Consistory, greatly aggravated Lekun's affront, and declared that in revenge he was resolved to join with the Emperor. But he had already done so, and the affair of Reggio was a mere pretence to deify the Cardinals.

Guicciard.

Whilst Lesfen was at Reggio, Adorno banished from Genoa, attempted to surprize that City with some Gallies supplied by the Pope and the Viceroy of Naples, but could not succeed. A few days after, Lesfen discovered a plot to surprize Cemo, and was fully informed that the Pope and the Emperor were the Authors. It is therefore evident, that in case they had succeeded in their designs, they would have made no scruple to appear the Aggressors.

Lefcu no longer doubting that there was a design to invade the Milanefe, acquainted the King, and withal, sent for the four thousand Switzers, intended for Milan, who were ready to march. Francis surprized at the danger the Milanefe was in, speedily ordered a Levy of twenty thousand Switzers, and sent Lautrec to Milan, promising he should wait for nothing. But this promise was but very ill performed.

Mean while, Prosper Colonna having assembled at Reggio the army of the Allies, besieged Parma, where Lefcun had now thrown in some Troops. But before he could take the place, Lautrec having received the Supplies he expected from Switzerland, forced him to raise the Siege, and purified him even beyond the borders of the Milence. As he imagined Parma to be out of danger, he had drawn out Lefcun with the Garrison to strengthen his army. But no sooner was Lefcun out of the City, than the Inhabitants declared for the Pope, and erected the Church's Colours on the Walls.

But this was not the only misfortune Laureic was to be exposed to during the Campaign. Presently after, he was defeated by the twenty thousand Switzers, he had lately received, and constrained to retire to Milan, where Prætor Colonna purified him in his turn, with all possible diligence. Whereupon Laureic, despairing of defending Milan, quitted the Town, after supplying the Castle with Ammunition, and withdrew to Como, where the four thousand Switzers he still had, forsook him and returned home, because he had no Money to pay them. So, Colonna, taking possession of Milan, went from thence to make other Conquests, which Laureic could not oppose. In a word, Francis lost the whole Duchy of Milan, except a few places.

and Colon-

Probably, Lautrec would not have been able to support himself long in Italy, had not the Pope's death, on the 10th of December, afforded him some respite. Leo X. is said to die with Joy, at the news of the good Success of the League. Some however affirm, his death was hastened by poison (2). However this be, the news of the Pope's death was no sooner spread, but the Troops he maintained, disbanded themselves. Of the twelve thousand Swissers he had in the army of the Allies, but fifteen hundred remained, and the Florentines retired to their own Country. Thus Proffer Colonna found himself in a few days, in as ill a situation as Lautrec. The College of Cardinals, not knowing what course to take, gave no orders, but deferred every thing till the Election of a new Pope. Mean while, the Duke of Ferrara recovered some of his Towns in la Romagna, and Franco Maria della Rovere, took possession again of the Duchy of Urbino. If Lautrec had then been supplied with the Men and Money he was promised, he would have doubtless expelled the Imperialists out of Milan. But Franis I, entirely neglecting the affairs of Italy, thought only of de.ending himself in Flanders and Picardy, where he was vigorously attacked. He still held however in Italy, Genoa, Cremena, the Castles of Milan and Nouarra, with some small places on the Lake Go da.

Guicciard.*

Whilst these things passed in Italy, the war at length was begun in the Low-Countries, in a manner very disadvantageous to France. The Troops raised by Robert de la Mark to besiege Vireton, being disbanded, Francis thought he had satisfied the Emperor and the King of England. It was indeed sufficient to take from Henry all pretence of declaring against him, since by the Treaty of League, in case one of the Allies was invaded, the rest were not to declare against the Aggressor, till being summoned to desert from the War, he should have refused. Francis was summoned, and had desisted, consequently Henry had no cause to complain. But it was otherwise with the Emperor, who was not contented with so slight a Satisfaction. He forbore however to complain of the King of France, but was resolved to be revenged of Robert de la Mark, who had dared to fend him a Defiance. Besides, he considered, if Francis undertook to defend that Prince, as it was very likely, he would incur the blame of the Rupture, and this was what the Emperor and Cardinal Wolsey chiefly desired, in order to make use of that inducement to persuade Henry to declare against France. So, Charles having prepared an Army, gave the Command to Henry Count of Nassau, who entering the Territories of Robert de la Mark, took and razed several places. Francis was patient, chusing rather to forsake his ally, than that the King of France, in pretence of an arm against him. Then Roxfort feeling himself without refuge, made his Submission to the Emperor, who granted him a Truce for six weeks. Mean while, though the Emperor had to deal only with a petty Prince, unable to resist him, and of whom he had been sufficiently revenged, he continued to reinforce his Army. Francis, seeing many Troops in the neighbourhood of Champagne, easily perceived, they were not solely designed against himself, la Mark, and that he might be taken unawares, unless he prepared for his defence. Mean while, he represented to the King of England, that he could not avoid taking arms, in order to resist the Emperor, who was preparing to attack him. Henry answered, he would side with neither, but as a common friend offered to be their Umopir. Adding, if they would both send their Plenipotentiaries to Colais the beginning of August, Cardinal Wolsey should be there, to act in his name as Mediator. Charles readily accepted so advantageous a proposal, since he and the Cardinal understood one another. As for Francis, he durst not reject it, though he had no reason to be pleased with the King of England. But he did not yet know that Wolsey was wholly devoted to the Emperor. It was therefore agreed, that the Plenipotentiaries of the two Monarchs, the Pope's Nuncio, and the Cardinal Mediator, should meet at Colais the 1st of August.

mean while, the Lord of Liquès (3) having levied an Army at his own charge, as he affirmed, surprized Mortagne, and St. Anand, in the Tournaisis, on pretence of some claim of his House. The Emperor affected to consider this as a private quarrel, in which he had no concern, though Liquès's Army was composed of his Subjects. His aim was to oblige Francis to take some step which might give occasion to accuse him of being the Aggressor. Herein he only imitated that Prince who had attacked Italy under the name of Robert de la Mark. But some time after, the Governor of Flanders besieging Tournay in turn, it was not possible to put so favorable a Construction upon that Siege, especially as what passed then in Italy left the Emperor no room to dissemble any longer. It is certain, Francis had been surprized as well in Italy as in Champagne and Flanders. He had intended no doubt to attack the Emperor, but did not expect to be invaded Conference at Calais. The time appointed for the Congress of Calais (1) being come, Cardinal Wolsey repaired thither with a numerous Retinue (2) and carried the Great Seal with him (3). It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he was furnished with several of the King's Commissions, to be used as he should think proper. By the first, he was constituted the King's Lieutenant General to adjust, as Mediator, the differences between the Emperor and the King of France. By a second, he was empowered to treat and conclude with Francis I., a renewal of the Alliance. But probably, this was only to show the French Ambassadors Henry's Impartiality and pretended design to join with that Prince, who should be found to be unjustly attacked. By a third, he had power to conclude a League between England and the Emperor, the Pope, the King of France, or any other Potentate whatever. Thus Henry, without having yet examined on which side the blame lay, left it to his Lieutenant to engage him in which Party he pleased. But very probably, his resolution was taken already, and the Congress of Calais intended only to show he was not resolved, till after a strict Information, and to cause the blame of the rupture to be thrown upon the King of France. All the proceedings of the Cardinal Mediator, discovered, that he meant not to procure a Peace between the two Monarchs, but only to find the King his master a pretence to declare for the Emperor.

While these affairs were negotiating at Calais, the Imperialists besieged and took Mouzon in Champagne. Then they ravaged the Country, and plundered the little Town of Subantion, where the Count of Nassau suffered his Soldiers to commit grievous outrages; after which he laid Siege to Mézieres. Francis wanting time to assemble his Army, could not be ready till the end of September - which however was soon enough to throw Succours into Mézieres, and thereby force the Count of Nassau to raise the Siege. The Earl of St. Pol recovered Mouzon shortly after, and the Count of Nassau retired into the Earlom of Namur. Champagne being thus freed, Francis ordered his Army to march into Flanders, where the Imperialists still continued the Siege of Tournay. When his Troops were drawn together, he assaulted Bapaume, Landrecy, Beaumont, and carried them. Afterwards hearing, the Emperor, who had headed his Army, was retiring towards Valenciennes, he resolved to go and attack him, but lost the opportunity by his own fault. 'Tis said, if he had been as speedy as he might, and ought to have been, he would have infallibly defeated the Emperor, who giving all over for lost, was retired with a hundred Horse only, quitting his Army, not to be a witness of their destruction. Upon this occasion, Francis I. gave the Duke of Bourbon Constable of France, great cause of disgust, by setting the Duke of Alençon at the head of the Vanguard, though that Post properly belonged to the Constable, when the King was in the Army. 'Tis said, the King gave the Constable this mortification, to oblige his Mother the Duchess of Angoulême, who hated him. But he had too much reason afterwards to repent his Complaisance to his Mother.

At the very time Francis I. was attacked in Champagne, he sent an Army into Navarre, under the Command of Admiral Bonnivet, who arrived about the end of September, at St. John de Luxe. At first, he pretended to march towards Pamplona. Then, after several Marches and Counter-marches, he suddenly approached, and besieged Fontarabia. When the breach was made, he ordered the Town to be furiously stormed, but however was bravely repulsed. But the Garrison, being little able to stand a second Assault, surrendered by Capitulation. This Conquest was of very great Importance, Fontarabia being one of the Keys of Spain.

While the War was vigorously continued in Italy, Champagne, Flanders, Picardy, Navarre, Cardinal Wolsey was busy at Calais in treating with the Plenipotentiaries of the Emperor and the King of France. This Congress lasted ten weeks, and the Parties could not be brought to agree. In all appearance, the Mediator, instead of closing, helped rather to widen, the Breach. It was long debated to know which had begun the War. This was the chief point with respect to Wolsey, who intended to throw the blame on the King of France. Afterwards, when the differences themselves came to be considered, the proposals of the Emperor's Plenipotentiaries showed a Peace was still very remote. They demanded restitution of the Duchy of Burgundy, and abolition of the Homage due to the Crown of France, for Flanders and Artois. The only reason they alleged to support their last pretension was, that it was becoming for an Emperor to do Homage to a King. These two Propositions were of such a nature, that Francis would hardly have accepted them, even after the loss of many Battles. On the other hand, the French Ambassadors having notice of what passed in Italy, earnestly demanded restitution of Milan, and that the Emperor should withdraw his Troops from before Tournay. They insisted moreover upon the restitution of Navarre, to which the Emperor was bound by the Treaty of Noyon. If the Emperor had been afraid of Henry's joining with the King of France, he might have granted part of these Demands without being forced to dismember his Dominions. But Francis could not resign Burgundy, without letting the Enemy into the heart of his Kingdom, nor the Homage of Flanders and Artois, without dishonor. But as the Emperor was secure of the King of England, he persisted in his demands, without any abatements.

After the Mediator had long feigned to endeavour only to procure a Peace, he declared, he saw no way to succeed. Then, he presented to the Plenipotentiaries a Treaty to sign, containing Articles of little Importance, namely, That the French and Flemings should have liberty to fish for Herrings till the end of January - That the two contending Monarchs should enjoy their Subjects to pursue no Vessel into the Ports or Harbours belonging to the King of England, and commit no Hostilities within the Territories of the said King, during the War - That the Pope's Nuncio, and the Plenipotentiaries at Calais might freely retire with all their Train, without receiving any injury from the Treaties of the two Monarchs - That the King of England and the Cardinal Legate his Lieutenant should be the Conservators of these Articles, to be ratified within ten days. We have here a very sensible proof of the Cardinal's Insolence, who, in a Treaty drawn by himself, presumed thus to set himself upon a level with his master, by being declared Conservator with the King. These Conventions were ratified by the two Monarchs the 2d and 11th of October, and there appears not in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the least Trace of any other Treaty made at Calais at that time.

Du Bellay (4) however says in his Memoirs, that the King of England having sent Ambassadors to Francis I. during the Congress of Calais, they laboured so effectually, that at length it was agreed, the Emperor should raise the Siege of Tournay, and withdraw his Troops out of the Milanese; that Francis should retire into France with his Army, and their differences be referred to the arbitration of the King of England. He adds, after these Conventions, each thought the Peace concluded, but that upon the Emperor's receiving news of the taking of Fontarabia, he demanded, before the Treaty was ratified, the restitution of that place, and upon Francis's refusal, the Treaty remained unexecuted. But very probably, this illustrious Author, who was better acquainted with the particulars of the War, than of the Negotiations, was misinformed. First, because the Collection of the Publick Acts, mentions not this pretended Treaty, though we see there another of much less Consequence concluded at the same time. Secondly, we don't find in the Collection, any Embassy from the King of England, either to the French King or the Emperor, in the time which must have preceded this same Treaty. Thirdly, there is no likelihood, the Emperor would have withdrawn his Troops out of the Milanese, that is, would have restored Milan to France, and lost the hopes of acquiring Tournay, which was now reduced to extremities, for the bare advantage of seeing Francis retire into his own Kingdom. In short, it may have been easily perceived, Henry was very far from the thoughts of forcing the Emperor to yield to these Terms, and it will still be more plainly perceived by what follows. Add to all these Considerations, that seeing the regard the Emperor and the King of France had for Cardinal Wolsey, it is not likely they should conclude a Treaty without his knowledge, and by the Ministry of other Ambassadors, whilst he was at Calais to do the Office of Mediator. It may be, these proposals were made to Francis, and he was so blind as to imagine they would take place, because he was yet ignorant of the secret Engagements of the King 1521. of England and his Minister, with the Emperor, and because such a report was spread in the Court of France. Be this as it will, after the taking of Fentarabia, the War continued without Intermiffion, and with great Animosity. Francis I. became master of Heldin about the beginning of November, and Tournay surrendered to the Emperor by Capitulation.

Meanwhile Cardinal Wolsey still remained at Calais, under colour of searching for some farther expedient to procure a Peace between the two Monarchs. He frequently sent Expreses to both, with Proposals which he knew they would not accept. At last, feigning to desire to gain time, he went himself to the Emperor at Bruges (1), where he was received with as much respect as if he had been King of England (2). Here he concluded with the Pope and the Emperor a League against France, by virtue of the Powers he had brought with him. By this Treaty the Pope engaged to thunder the Church's Censures against the King of France. Henry was to invade him with an Army of forty thousand Men. The Emperor and Henry obliged themselves to break all their engagements with him. Moreover, Henry promised to give in marriage to the Emperor the Princess Mary, affianced to the Dauphin. These were the chief Articles a-

Hitherto Cardinal Wolsey had pushed his Fortune to such a height, that it seemed difficult to make any addition to it. And yet all this was not capable to satisfy him. His Legateship had been prolonged for two years, the beginning of this year. But he thought himself to be too much above all other Legates, not to have a different Communion from theirs. In April he procured from Leo X a Bull, empowering him to make fifty Knights, fifty Count Palatines, as many Acolyths (4) and Chaplains, forty Notaries Apostolic, who should have the same Privileges as those made by the Pope; & legitimate Bastards, give Degrees in Arts, Law, Physick, and Divinity, and grant all sorts of Dispensations. In a word, not content with all the Riches he possessed, or with the means he had to increase them incessantly, he caused also the rich Abbey of St. Albans to be given him this year.

It is no wonder, if, being arrived to so high a degree of Grandeur and Riches, his pride increased in proportion. Though the King's blindness for him was inconceivable, it was not so with the Courtiers, who saw but too plainly how grossly he misled his Master, who placed too great confidence in him. But none dared to take notice of it, such was the dread of his haughty and revengeful temper. The Duke of Buckingham, Son of the Duke of the same Name, who in the Reign of Richard III.

loft his head on the Scaffold for endeavouring to procure the Crown for Henry VII, sadly experienced how dangerous it was to discover what was thought of that proud Prelate. He happened one day to fay, in the hearing of one who betrayed him (5), that in cafe the King died without Ifsue, he thought he had a Right to the Crown, and if ever he ascended the Throne, his first care should be to punish the Cardinal according to his deserts. The Duke's title was not altogether groundless, since he was descended from Ann of Gloucester, Grandaughter to Edward III. Doctor Morton, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, prefied the Duke his Father to endeavour to seize the Crown; but the Duke chose rather to act for the Earl of Richmond than for himself, as was shown in the Reign of Richard III. What the Son had said concerning his Title, was therefore rather imprudent than criminal, since he pretended not to the Crown unless the King died without Heirs. Indeed, his Title might be ill-grounded; but he had done nothing to support it. His crime then consisted only in what he had said against the Cardinal, who, for that reason, resolved to dispatch him. For that purpose, he gained some of his Domesticks, and learnt by their means that he had consulted a certain Monk (6), who pretended to foretell things to come, and had conferred with him several times since April 1512. Probably, the Duke, fond of his title, had inquired of the Monk whether the King would die without Children. And that was sufficient to give the Cardinal occasion to misconstrue all his proceedings. When he believed he had sufficient evidence against him, he began with depriving him of his two principal supports; namely, [Henry Percy] Earl of Northumberland his Father-in-law, whom he sent to the Tower on some pretence (7), and [Thomas Howard] Earl of Surrey (8) his Son-in-law, on whom he conferred the Government of Ireland, to remove him from London. Presently after the Duke was apprehended (9) and accused of High-Treason. The substance of his Impeachment was, That he had several times consulted the Monk concerning the succession to the Crown, and affected to make himself popular. The Duke confessed he had talked sometimes with the Monk; but denied it to be with the intent he was charged with. However, he was condemned to die as a Traitor, which he could not bear to hear when the sentence was pronounced (10). My Lord of Norfolk, cried he, you have said as a Traitor should be said unto, but I was never one. My Lords, continued he, addressing himself to the Peers his Judges, I nothing malign for what you have done to me, but the eternal God forgive you my death, and I do. I shall never live to the King for life, but he it is a gracious Prince, and more grace may come from him than I desire. My Lords and all my Fellows I desire you to pray for me. When he said he would not sue to the King for Life, his meaning was, he thought it would be fruitless, knowing he was the Cardinal's victim, who had an absolute sway over the King. Indeed, the Minister had so ordered it, that though all the Peers of the Realm had a Right to assist at the Trial, there were present only one Duke, one Marquis, seven Earls, and twelve Barons (11); and probably, he had secured the Majority. All the favor the Duke received was to be beheaded, instead of dying the death of a Traitor (12). This execution was attended with loud murmurs among the People, and satyrical Libels against the Cardinal, wherein was said among other things, that it was not strange the Son of a Butcher should delight in shedding Blood. But this was all the revenge that was taken for this injustice. He was too deeply rooted in the King's mind, to fear these murmurs, which besides never reached the King's ears, all about him being either Spies or Creatures of the Cardinal.

The King was then wholly intent upon one affair, Affair of namely, the War he had resolv'd to make upon France, Scotland.

Henry was not satisfied with summoning the Regent, but sent also a Letter to the Parliament of Scotland, containing the same Accusations against the Duke of Albany, and a charge to the States to expel him the Kingdom. The Substance of the Parliament's answer was: That what had been reported to his Majesty concerning the Duke of Albany's return into Scotland, to take forcible possession of the King's person, was utterly false: That the Duke did nothing with regard to the King, that could breed the least suspicion, since he did not so much as offer to change any of his Domesticks, without the consent of the States, and that it was with the Queen's advice and consent, that they had taken care of the Guardianship and Education of the King: That they could not believe the Duke had ever intended to put away his Wife, and marry the Queen, or that the Queen had any thoughts of espousing the Duke: That as for the Treaty with the King of France, to hinder the Duke of Albany's return into Scotland, it was never communicated to them, neither had they any knowledge of it: That they could not help thinking such a Treaty very strange, since they rather imagined, his Majesty should have solicited the Duke to return to defend the King his Nephew against his rebellious Subjects, whereas they saw with grief, it was he who fomented the Rebellion: That if it continued thus, they did not see how it was possible to keep a good understanding between the two Kingdoms: That however, if he would be pleased to send away the Bishop of Dunkeld from his Court, and without interposing in the affairs of Scotland, leave to the Regent and States the care of governing the Kingdom, a Truce might be concluded till the Embassy that was to be sent to him, was ready. But that, in case he would have no Truce, unless they expelled the Regent, they would endeavour to defend themselves in the best manner they could.

Henry could not expect any other answer, since he was conscious to himself, that his accusations against the Regent of Scotland were only affected pretences to complain indirectly of the King of France. He ordered however the Lord Dacres (2) to march into Scotland with five hundred Men, and proclaim on the Borders, that if the Scots made no Peace with him by such a time (3), it should be to their peril. But he did not support this Bravado (4). His sole aim was to furnish his Party in Scotland with a pretence to refuse to serve the Regent, in case he attempted to make a Diversion in England in favour of France. And in this he was not disappointed. In October following, the Regent of Scotland raising an Army to make an Inroad into England, was no sooner come to the Borders, but many of the Lords refused to attend any farther, alleging, they were unwilling to engage the Kingdom in an unnecessary War with England. The opposition the Duke of Albany found in his Army, convincing him he should be able to do nothing considerable, he proposed a Truce, which the English gladly accepted. For, Henry's aim was only to terrify the Scots with a dread of the Success of a War with England during the Minority of their King. So, the Duke of Albany seeing it was not in his power to serve France as he desired, returned about the end of October to Paris, in order to take fresh measures with the King. Thus Henry attained his ends, in avoiding a rupture with Scotland, as a War with that Kingdom could not but extremely incommode him, in his present Circumstances.

Mean while, Francis I., having had some Intelligence of what passed at Bruges between the Emperor and the Cardinal, and desiring to convince Henry how directly contrary to the League of London his proceedings were, sent him Letters Patents (5) inserting the Article of the Treaty, whereby they were engaged mutually to assist one another. Then he recited what the Emperor had done against him, as well in Italy, as in Champagne and Flanders, and summoned him to perform the Treaty he had solemnly sworn. Henry in answer sent a Herald to proclaim War against him (6), alleging, he was obliged to it by the same Treaty of London, because Francis had first attacked the Emperor, and moreover had disappointed him with respect to the Duke of Albany (7). This War was once more declared between France and England, upon very frivolous, not to say unjust occasions. But Wolsey had the art of persuading the King his master to whatever he pleased.

Henry having without cause proclaimed War against France, did not dare to call a Parliament to demand a Subsidy. For he could allege neither any just cause, nor any necessity for undertaking a War destructive to the English Merchants. However, Money must be raised, and it was the Cardinal's Buifins, who had embarked him in the War, to find means. The Expedient he Hall. 1 thought most proper was, to order the Sheriffs to send a List of the names of all above sixteen years old, with an exact account of what each person was worth in Land, Stocks, Moveables, and Money. This was such a Survey as was formerly taken in the reign of William the Conqueror, and had given so great cause of complaint to the Nation (8). This was followed by a general Loan of the tenth of his Lay-Subjects, and a fourth of the Clergy, according to the true value of their Estates, besides twenty thousand pounds which the King borrowed of the City of London in particular. Thus one injustice commonly draws on another. This War was manifestly unjust, and became still more so by the means employed to maintain it. These kinds of involuntary Loans, to which certain Kings of England have sometimes forced their Subjects, are a manifest violation of the privileges of the people, and tend directly to arbitrary power. If the King may oblige his Subjects to furnish him with Money, when he shall think necessary, though it be by way of Benevolence or Loan, it may be abused, he will very seldom, or perhaps never think himself obliged to call a Parliament. It is true, Henry was neither the first nor last that used this extraordinary method to raise Money. But, though he was so fortunate as to receive no prejudice by it, some of his Successors who were pleased to imitate him, were not so happy.

This general Loan made a great noise over all the Kingdom. Every one openly exclaimed against the Cardinal, who was the Author. But he little regarded the people's clamours, because he was supported by the King. However, though at first he had given orders to exact Loans with the same rigour, as if they had been a Tax imposed by the Parliament, he met with so many obstacles, that he was apprehensive of raising in the Kingdom Combinations not to be appeased at his pleasure. So, the Tax was levied much more gently than at first was intended. This caused so great a mistake in the Cardinal's Calculation, that the King was forced at last to recur to the usual method of a Parliament to maintain the War, as we shall see presently. The London Merchants were the most strenuous opposers of the levying this Tax. They were required to declare upon Oath the real value of their Effects; but they firmly refused it, alleging, it was not possible for them to give an exact account of their Effects, part whereof was in the hands of their Correspondents in foreign Countries. At length by Agreement, the King

That they should make neither Peace nor Truce without a mutual consent.

That if any places should be conquered upon France, they should be restored to him of the two Allies, who had a right to them; and to prevent all disputes, each should declare his pretensions before the first of May 1524.

That if the King of England intended to subdue Scotland, or reduce Ireland to an entire obedience, or the Emperor to recover Guedres or Friesland; if the Scots invaded England, or the Duke of Guedres made War upon the Emperor; in all these cases the two Monarchs should be bound to assist one another.

That they submitted to the Spiritual Jurisdiction of the Cardinal of York as Legate, and required him to pronounce the Sentence of Excommunication against him of the two that should first violate the Treaty.

That the Treaty should be kept private, so that the common Enemy might have no knowledge thereof.

That the Pope should be entreated to enter into the League as a principal Contractor, and reputed as such, provided he accepted it within three months.

That the Venetians should be likewise admitted, provided they renounced their Alliance with France.

That the two Monarchs should use their utmost endeavours to persuade the Switzers to forsake the French, or at least to be neutral.

The same day the Treaty was signed, the Emperor signed also Letters Patents, promising to pay Henry whatever was due to him from Francis, in case Francis, on account of the present League, should refuse to continue the payments to which he was obliged.

But Cardinal Wolsey had not waited to do his own affairs till the King's were finished, for on the eighth of June the Emperor, by Letters Patents, engaged to pay him the pension of twelve thousand Livres (1), which the King of France gave him for the Bishoprick of Tournay. Some days after, he obliged himself to pay him a pension of two thousand five hundred Ducats, till the like pension was assigned him upon the vacant Churches in Spain, in lieu of that he received out of the Bishoprick of Badajoz, which the Emperor desired to discharge. But the Emperor's Bounties to Cardinal Wolsey were amply recompensed, by a great Sum lent him by the King before his departure.

During the Emperor's stay in England, which was about five weeks, he so won the affection of the whole Court by his Civilities, Careless and Presents, that he was almost free of leaving none but Friends about the King. He gained the Good-will of the English, chiefly by constituting the Earl of Surrey Admiral of his Fleet (2). The Commission was drawn whilst the Emperor was at London, before his Journey to Windsor. As he was to make some farther stay in England, the Earl of Surrey taking with him both the English and Flemish Fleets, made two descents into France, and carried away a rich Booty (3). Then he returned and conveyed the Emperor to Spain (4).

I must now briefly relate the Success of the Wars which were waging in several places. The death of Leo X had put the affairs of the Allies in Italy in a very ill situation. The Troops of the Church and of Florence had relinquished the Army, immediately after the news of the Pope's death. Besides that, Prosper Colonna receiving no more Supplies of Money, either from Rome or the Emperor, was forced to disband most of his remaining Troops, and to keep but what was absolutely necessary for the defence of Milan. Mean while, the Emperor ordered a Levy of six thousand Landquents (5), which Francesco Sforza, and Hieronymo Adorno a Genoese were to lead into Italy. Shortly after, Lautrec received a re-inforcement of sixteen thousand Switzers, which rendered him superior to the Allies, and yet he could not hinder the Landquents from joining the Emperor's army. His only refuge was to try to bring the Imperialists to a Battle, and for that purpose he besieged Pavia; but Prosper Colonna found means to throw Switzers into the place without running any hazard. Whereupon Lautrec despairing of Success, raised the Siege, and encamped at Monza, and Colonna, who was afraid for Milan, posted himself at Biccoca, a Country Seat with a large Park, capable of being easily fortified, being surrounded with a deep Ditch. Here Colonna intrenched himself in such a manner, that he could not be attacked without rashness. Lautrec had no Inclination to attack the Imperialists in this post, but could not possibly help it. His Switzers would have Money, and he had none to give them, Luisa of Savoy, the King's Mother, having applied to other uses the four hundred thousand Crowns designed for the Army in Italy. Mean while, the Switzers pressed their General either to give them Money, or lead them to Battle, else they were resolved to return home. This put him at length upon assaulting the Camp at Biccoca, where he was repulsed with great loss (6); after which, the Switzers quitting him, he was constrained to repass the Mountains, not being able to withstand the Imperialists. Presently after Colonna became master of Genoa. This rich City being taken by surprize, whilst a Capitulation was negotiating, was miserably sacked. In short, Francis had nothing left in Italy, but the Castles of Milan and Gremona, and even these were very closely blocked up.

In other parts where the War was carrying on during this Campaign, France was more prosperous. After Admiral Bonnivet had taken Pontarabie, the Spaniards invested that place, and continued the Siege, without being able to accomplish their Enterprize. At last, Marshall de Chabanes being sent into Bearn to take the Command of the French Army, in the room of Marshall de Chatillon, who was dead, raised the Siege, and appointed one Fraugot Governor of Pontarabie, who afterwards behaved very ill.

In Picardy and Champagne, the Imperialists and English having joined their Forces, performed nothing of moment. The two Armies, commanded by the Count de Bure for the Emperor, and by the Earl of Surrey for the King of England (7), were so superior to those of France, that the Duke of Vendôme, who commanded Picardy, was not able to resist them. So, having furnished the Towns with Ammunition, he contented himself with incessantly annoying them with a small Body of Troops. In September the two Generals besieged Hesdin, but after having been five or six weeks before the Town, were forced to retire. From thence they marched to Dourlens, and finding the place deserted, and the Gates pulled down, set fire to it. Then intending to approach Corbie in October, the bad weather, and the care the French had taken for the defence of the place, hindered their undertaking the Siege. After that, the Imperialists retired into Artois, and the English returned home (8).

Thus all the efforts of the Emperor and the King of England would have done Francis no great mischief this Campaign, if he had not himself been the Cause of his ill success in Italy, by neglecting to find the Switzers Money. Indeed, if Lautrec had not been forced to attack the Imperialists at Biccoca, probably he would have been master of Milan before the end of the Campaign. Charles V then perceived, that to gain any considerable advantages upon France, much greater efforts were to be used, and for that reason continued to care for Cardinal Wolsey, in order to secure the King his Master's assistance. The Collection of the Publick Aids, there is a Letter of his to the Cardinal, full of obliging expressions, plainly denoting his want of him. I return you Thanks, said he to him, for the good Affection you have always shown me, desiring you to continue it, as I firmly believe you will, for you are sensible that I place my whole Confidence in you. Again, I entreat you to give the same credit to my said Ambassadors as to myself, and show yourself, on this occasion, as I take you to be, my good and faithful Friend, for I shall have a grateful remembrance of it.

The extraordinary method used by the Cardinal to raise Money, having been very disagreeable to the English, he judged it more proper to proceed for the future in the usual way; and therefore the King assembled a Parliament the 15th of April 1523 (9). The Convocation 1523. meeting at the same time according to Custom (1), the Cardinal resolved to establish a good Precedent in favour of the King, by exacting from the Clergy a considerable Subsidy. His character of Legate gave him such an interest with that Body, that he was almost sure of obtaining whatever he pleased to demand. But to find less difficulties, he removed, on divers pretences, some of those from whom he feared to meet opposition, and gained others by promises or threats. Matters being thus ordered, he demanded of the Clergy a Subsidy of one half of their annual Revenues, payable in five years. Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester, John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, and a Proctor of the inferior Clergy, one Philips, would have opposed this exaction; but the Cardinal treated them in such a manner, as discouraged the rest from supporting them. So the Subsidy was granted; though the Clergy privately murmured, that the Pope's Legate who ought to maintain their Rights was the first to violate them.

This affair being thus ended with respect to the Clergy, the Cardinal repaired to the House of Commons, where he made a long Speech, endeavouring to shew the necessity of the War the King had undertaken, by aggravating the pretended injuries he had endured from the King of France. He concluded with demanding a Subsidy of the fifth part of the Goods of every Lay-Subject, to be paid in four years (2). This demand caused warm debates among the Commons. Several represented, that if the Kingdom was actually invaded, hardly could the King require such a Subsidy, much less for a War wantonly undertaken, and rather for the interest of the Emperor than of England. However, as the Court-Party were very numerous in the House, it was resolved to grant the King a Subsidy, which was but one half of what was demanded. The Cardinal, who was used to be complied with, was extremely offended at the opposition of the Commons. He went again to the House, and told them, he desired to reason with those who opposed his demands. But the Commons replied by their Speaker (3), That it was the Order of that House to hear, and not to reason, but among themselves. At this reply, the Cardinal withdrew, extremely mortified, perceiving he could only prejudice the King's affairs, in attempting to treat the Commons with the same haughtiness he treated the rest of the World. His solicitation however had some effect, since there was an addition made to the Subsidy (4).

Besides this affair, for which properly the Parliament was called, nothing remarkable passed in this Session, except an Act of Attainder against the late Duke of Buckingham, who had been condemned by a sentence of his Peers. As all the World was satisfied this Sentence had been procured by indirect and irregular methods, and the Cardinal publicly accused of having sacrificed that Lord to his vengeance, he had the interest to obtain this Act, in order to divert the blame thrown upon him. But without the Parliament shewed that the Act was passed out of mere condescension, since by another, Henry Stafford Son of the deceased was restored to his Estate and Honours (5). A Statute was made also this Session, empowering the King [for his Life] to repeal all Attainders of High-Treason, by his Letters Patents under the Great-Seal (6).

These were the first attempts made in this Reign to render the King master of the Debates of the Parliament. Cardinal Wolsey was the first Author, and unfortunately for the Subjects, the King too well improved his Minister's instructions. Such Favorites as this have but too much cause to fear the Parliament, and therefore strive to the utmost of their power to lessen its Authority, by enlarging that of the Sovereign who supports them. But their labour is in vain; very few fail at last of falling in to the hands of that Authority they have endeavoured to destroy. Wolsey is one of those who have the most openly abused their favour, not only against the Nation's, but also the King's interest, which was much less dear to him than his own. He was never contented with Estates or Honours. The 24th of March this year he procured for himself the Bishoprick of Durham, one of the richest in the Kingdom, in lieu of Bath and Wells, which he was willing to resign. Two months after, Adrian VI prolonged his Legateship for five years, after the expiration of the Term granted by Leo X. Thus Estates and Honours were incessantly heaped upon him, without however any possibility of satisfying his greediness. Indeed, he carried his desires much higher, since he still aspired to the Papacy, Adrian's Age and Infirmities giving occasion to think his Pontificate would not last long. He still expected to be raised to that high Dignity by the Emperor's means, and therefore forgot nothing to procure his favour. To this doubtless must be ascribed the honorable reception given this year to Christiern King of Denmark and Sweden, who had married the Emperor's Sister. This Prince having by his cruelties rendered himself odious to his Subjects, and for that reason been expelled his Dominions, arrived in England about Midsummer with his Queen, and was received as a King unjustly oppressed, and not like one that had by his Barbarities drawn his misfortunes upon himself. Henry was not contented to do him all possible Honour, but moreover renewed with him the Treaty of Alliance between England and Denmark, as if that Prince had still been in possession of his Dominions.

This was the fruit of Cardinal Wolsey's interested Counsels, who never regarded either Honour or Justice, in gratifying his Passions. He expected every thing from the Emperor, and therefore used his utmost endeavours to increase that Monarch's power, that he might be better able to perform his promise. It was not the Cardinal's fault that France was not utterly ruined. At least he formed, this year, in conjunction with the Emperor, projects tending to the entire dissolution of that ancient Monarchy.

Though by the Treaty of Bruges, ratified by the Emperor and Henry at Windfor, they were not to enter France till 1524, an opportunity which offered causing them to take other measures, they resolved to anticipate their expedition, and invade the King of France in three different places. The Emperor was to have a strong Army on the Frontiers of Spain, to become master of Pontarabie and Bayonne. Henry was to employ his Forces in Picardy, jointly with those of the Low-Countries, and the Constable of Bourbon, who had suffered himself to be corrupted by the Emperor, or perhaps by his own offer, was to make an Inroad into Burgundy. As most of the events of the following years, turn upon that Prince's diffult, it will be requisite briefly to mention the Reasons.

The Duke of Bourbon, Prince of the Blood Royal of France, had received the Constable's Sword ever since the first year of Francis I. He had all the qualifications necessary for that High-Post. Perhaps he had too much P. merit, since, if we believe Mezerai, Luísia of Savoie, Mother to Francis, wished to have him for her Husband. But as he feigned not to understand what she desired, he made her his irreconcilable Enemy. From that time, he perpetually received mortifications from the King, over whom the Duchess his Mother had too great an ascendancy. The first mentioned in History, was when in 1521 the King commanding the Army in Perion, gave the conduct of the van to the Duke of Alençon, contrary to the Prerogative annexed to the Office of Constable. But this was nothing in comparison of another, which however is related in the History of France only upon uncertain Reports. The King telling the Constable he should be glad to marry him to the Duchess his Mother, received an answer so injurious to the Duchess (7), that he gave him a box on the Ear. This Fact is not perhaps sufficiently attested. But however, it is certain the Duchess's affection for the Constable turned to hatred. From thenceforward he was looked upon with an evil eye at Court, and no more trusted with the command of the King's Armies. This was sufficient to give him great diffult. But his Enemy not being satisfied with these Mortifications

But afterwards, by the liberal Motion of some, particularly of Sir John Huse a Knight of Lincolnshire, those of fifty Pounds a year and upwards were induced to give the Standing Army for three years to come, which at length being continued to the fourth year, and extended to those who were worth five Pounds a Year, was all that could be obtained. Hall, fol. 210. Herbert, p. 56.

(6) He was only restored in Blood, and not to Honours and Lands. However, the King by Letters Patents bearing date the 23th of September this year, granted to him and Ursula his Wife, Daughter of Sir Richard Pals, by Margaret of Clarence, part of the Lands of the late Duke of Buckingham, among which was the Castle and Manor of Stafford. Dugdale's Baron, Vol. I. p. 171.

That no Person, continuing the College of Physicians. 3. By another, the Marriage of the six Clerks in Chancery is allowed. 4. It was enacted, that no Person, of what Estate, degree, or condition heever, shall kill any Hare in the Snow, with a Dog, or otherwise, upon pain of forfeiting six Shillings and 5. on continuing the College of Physicians. 6. The Cause was naturally to be tried by the Parliament of Paris; but the Dukes put it into the hands of the Chancellor and some other Commissioners, her Creatures, which convinced the Constable that his ruin was determined. So perceiving no way to avoid so fatal a blow, his despair caused him to throw himself into the Emperor's Arms. A French Lord (1) was the manager of this Negotiation, wherein the King of England interposed, as being equally concerned with the Emperor to create troubles in France. It is hard to know exactly when this Negotiation began; but we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts of England, the Treaty was advanced the 17th of May 1523. We see there Henry's Commission to Richard Sampson and Richard Jerningham, to treat with the Duke of Bourbon (2) in order to draw him into the League. This Commission empowered the Envoys also to receive of the same Prince a promise or engagement to own Henry for King of France, to do him Homage and swear Fealty to him. It cannot be inferred from hence, that the Constable entered into any such Engagement, but only that Henry intended to draw him into it. However this be, by the Treaty made by the Duke with the two Monarchs, after the Conquest of France, he was to have for his part, Provence, to be erected into a Kingdom, and was to marry Leonora the Emperor's Sister, Widow of Don Emanuel King of Portugal (3). The Duke was to bring into the Field an Army of his Friends and Vassals, to whom the Emperor promised to join seven or eight thousand Men. This Army was to act in the Bowels of the Kingdom, whilst the Emperor and Henry invaded Bearn and Picardy.

joins with the Emperor
of France.

Mean while, Francis I, ignorant of the designs of his Enemies, was solely employed in preparing to recover the Duchy of Milan, where he intended to command his Army in Person. He hastened his preparations the more, because the Venetians were strongly solicited to join with his Enemies, on pretence that he amused them with the vain hopes of seeing them speedily in Italy with a powerful Army. But notwithstanding all his diligence, it was not possible to avoid that Misfortune. The Venetians seeing no French Army arrive, and desending to be exposed to the Emperor's Indignation, entered at last into the League against France, about the end of July (4).

On the other hand, Pope Adrian VI, laboured with all his power to procure a Truce between the Christian Princes, fancying after that there would be no difficulty to unite them together in a War against the Turks. But as his genius was mean, and very different from that of Leo X, and Julius II his Predecessors, instead of making the Princes subservient to his designs, he was himself, without knowing it, instrumental to those of them. The Emperor told him he heartily desired the Truce, but intimated the necessity of its being for some time, in order to reap the intended advantage. He thereby laid an invincible obstacle in the way, because the King of France being lately dispossessed of the Duchy of Milan, would never hearken to a long Truce, which would afford his Enemies time to secure their Conquest. That Monarch's opposition gave the Emperor and the King of England occasion to engage the Pope to proceed farther, by hinting to him, that after the Example of some of his Predecessors, he should exert his Apostolick Power, which no Christian Prince would presume directly to oppose. Pleaded with these hopes, Adrian published a Bull dated the 30th of April, enjoining by virtue of the power committed to him by God, a three years Truce between all Christian Princes under pain of Excommunication and Interdict, against those that should refuse to observe it. But the King of France disregarding such a Truce, continued his preparations for the Milan Expedition, and ordered his Troops to march towards Italy. Then the Pope was told, that Francis alone, by his Non-compliance and Obstinacy, hindered the Christians from joining their Forces against the Turks. By these secret practices the good Pope was gradually brought to conclude a League against France with the Emperor, the King of England, Ferdinand Archduke of Austria the Emperor's Brother, the Duke of Milan, the Genoeses, and the Florentines. This League was signed the 3d of August, a few days after the Venetians had deserted France.

Italy seemed by this League to be secured from all Invasions. And indeed, Prosper Colonna, who commanded in Milan, so little expected to be attacked, that he neglected to take necessary measures for the defence of that Duchy. Mean while, Francis pursued his project, and moved, as he heard there were no preparations at Milan. The Emperor seemed wholly to neglect the defence of that State, on purpose to draw Francis into Italy, reckoning that his absence would promote the Duke of Bourbon's designs. Nay, it is said, that to induce Francis to absent himself from his Kingdom, Henry had caused him to be privately told, there was no danger from him that year in Picardy.

Affairs being in this situation, Francis departed for Lyons in order to pass into Italy. In the mean while, the Emperor was preparing an Army in Spain to besiege Fontarabia and Bayonne. But this Army was raised very slowly, because it was not till Francis was engaged in the War of Milan. On the other side, the Count de Bure (5), his General in Flanders, remained quiet, waiting to join the English, who the better to deceive the King of France, were not to land at Calais till the end of September. In short, the Emperor ordered eight thousand Landquents to march in small Divisions into France, who were to join the Duke of Bourbon as soon as he was ready. Upon that Prince's revolt, the Allies built all their hopes, imagining that Francis being in Italy, France thus unexpectedly invaded in so many places at once, would make no great resistance. These hopes were the better grounded, as Francis having no intelligence of the Duke of Bourbon's Plots, had no Troops at all in Burgundy, few in Guienne and Bearn, and Picardy was in an ill State of Defence.

Mean while, the Constable, not to be obliged to attend the King, pretended to be sick at Moulins. But Francis, whilst on the road to Lyons, happened to be informed by two of the Constable's Servants, that their Master held a private Correspondence with the Emperor. Surprized at the news, he turned out of his way to go to Moulins, where he told the Duke, who still feigned to be sick, what had been discovered to him. The Duke freely owned, the Emperor had sounded him by the Count de Rous, but that he had refused to hearken to his Proposals: That he designed to inform his Majesty of it, but being prevented by his Illness from coming to Court, he durst not trust any Person with the secret. Whether the King believed what the Constable said, or thought he could not arrest him in his own Territories, he was contented with ordering him to follow him to Lyons. The Duke set out indeed as if he had intended to follow the King, being carried in a Litter on pretence of his Sickness, and travelling by very easy Journeys. But upon notice that two of his Confidants were arrested at Court, he privately withdrew from his attendants; and taking with him only Pomperan one of his Gentlemen, he escaped through by-ways, and safely arrived [at Trent] in Germany.

The Constable's Flight convincing the King, there was some grand Plot in France, to be executed during his absence, he relinquished his design of going into Italy, and contented himself with sending his Army (6) under the Command of Admiral Bonnivet, who passed the Alps about the end of August, or the beginning of September. About the same time the Emperor assembled his Army in Spain, the Landquents arrived in France, and the English landed at Calais, to act in Picardy in conjunction with the Flemings. It will be absolutely necessary briefly to relate what passed during this Campaign in these four several places.

The Castle of Milan, where Lautrec had left a Garrison, surrendered the 14th of April. So the French had no place of importance in the Milanese, except the Castle of Cremona, which too was so closely blocked up, that there was no likelihood of its holding out long. On the other hand, as France could expect no farther assistance from the Venetians, and as all the rest of Italy was joined in a League against her, Prosper Colonna who commanded in Milan, did not doubt that the King would desert from his design of carrying War into the Milanese. For that reason, he had neglected to repair the Fortifications of the capital City, which were in an ill State, the Ramparts being fallen down in several Places. However upon advice that Admiral Bonnivet was going to pass the Alps, 1523. he drew together all his Forces to try to defend the passage of the Tefin; but he came too late. The French had made such speed, that he was forced to retire to Milan in the utmost disorder. Nay, he resolved to abandon that City, if by an unaccountable negligence, they had not given him some days time to repair the Works. He had but fifteen thousand Men, with which he could not expect to defend, against an Army of above forty thousand, so large a City, which also was open in several Places. However, as he had learnt by long experience, that it must not always be thought, the Enemies will do what is most for their advantage, he never ceased repairing the places which wanted it most, deeming he could but withdraw at last in case the French were as expeditious as they ought to have been. If Bonivet had marched directly to Milan, he would have found the Gates open. But after taking Navarra and Vigerano, and passing the Tefin without opposition, he preposterously imagined a few days more or less would signify nothing. So having lost to no purpose four or five days, he gave the Emperor's General time to put Milan in a posture of Defence (1). At last, approaching the City when it was too late, he found it incapable of being attacked, by the good management of Colonna. Whereupon he resolved to encamp at Chiavarella, in hopes of cutting off the Provisions of Milan, and of having the Imperialists at his mercy. But he took his measures too ill, that after persisting in his design till the end of November, he was forced himself to remove from Milan for want of Provisions. All he did during that time was to relieve the Castle of Cremona, reduced to the last Extremities (2). Such was the success of Bonivet's Campaign, which might have been more glorious for him, and more advantageous for the King his Master, had he taken juster measures, and improved his Superiority. Colonna died shortly after, and Lamy Viceroy of Naples took the command of the imperial Army. The Season was so far advanced, that nothing remarkable passed in those parts till the end of the year, when the Duke of Bourbon came and took the command of the Emperor's Troops, not without Lamy's great disgust, who unwillingly resigned his Post to a Foreigner.

The Allies, as I said, were resolved not to invade France till September, because it was to be presumed, the King would then be employed in Italy. For this reason it was the beginning of that month before the Emperor assembled his Army in Spain. Lautrec, who commanded in Guienne, hearing the Spaniards were drawing together, hastened to the Frontiers, to provide for the defence of Bayonne and Pontarabia, which were most exposed. Fraugot, an Officer of note, was Governor of Pontarabia, having been left there the last year by Marshall de Obachans. Lautrec relying upon Fraugot's Bravery and Experience, left him in the same Post, after having reinforced the Garrison, and laid in some Ammunition. After that, he did not question, the place would be able to maintain a long Siege. These precautions being taken with regard to Pontarabia, he repaired to Bayonne. He was no sooner arrived, than the Spanish Army appeared before the Walls, supported by a Fleet, which threw the Inhabitants into great Consternation, the Town being weak towards the Sea. But Lautrec so managed it, that the Spaniards were disappointed, though they had expected to carry the place without opposition. Perceiving therefore, that the Siege would employ them too long, they suddenly raised it, and invested Pontarabia, which was safely surrendered by Fraugot, in very few days (3). He was like to have lost his head for a fault of that consequence. But though he preferred his Life, he saved not his honour being publicly degraded.

The Emperor was not so successful in Burgundy and Champagne. Lamabe de Noyers, the Duke of Bourbon's Officer, was gone some time since into Germany, to conduct into Burgundy, Count de Furstemberg, who, with seven or eight thousand Landfiscouts, was to join there the Duke of Bourbon. Though this project seemed to be frustrated by the Duke's flight, Count de Furstemberg however entered Champagne with his Army. He immediately took Caffy and Montclar, small places which made no great resistance. But the Duke of Guise, who commanded in that Province, knowing Furstemberg had no Cavalry, assembled all the Nobles of the Country, and forming some Squadrons, closely followed the Germans.

Furstemberg finding himself too weak in the heart of the Enemy's Country, and having no Horse to oppose to those of the Duke of Guise, resolved to retire into Lorraine. He could not however make his retreat without receiving a terrible check near Neufchitel, where the Duke of Guise defeated the best part of his Troops.

Whilst the War was carrying on in Italy, Bourbon, in Champagne, Henry embarked his Troops under the Command of the Duke of Suffolk (4), who landing at Calais (5), joined the Count de Bure, the son of Septem-ber. These two Bodies made together an Army of twenty five, or thirty thousand Foot, and about six thousand Horse. The Duke de la Trimouille, who commanded in that Country, was so inferior in number of Troops, that he durst not keep the Field. All he could do was to throw Succours into the places most exposed, and speedily inform the King of what passed in those parts. Francis I., being then at Lyon, was extremely embarrassed to withstand so many unexpected Invasions. His last, that deceived by false Advice from England, he had been in hopes Picardy for this year would be un molested, and yet, he saw it was there his Enemies intended to make their greatest Effort. In this perplexity, he immediately dispatched the Duke of Vendôme, with all the Troops he could assemble, both to defend Picardy, and secure Farr, where he did not question, the alarm was very great. Indeed, the Duke of Suffolk, and the Count de Bure, passing by Trouennes, Hesdin and Dourlens, had taken R, and Montdidier, and were advanced as far as Compiègne. But the news of the Duke of Vendôme's march, causing them to be more circumspect, they thought proper to proceed no farther, and the rather because the Season began to be very incommodious, and they were afraid of being intercepted between the Dukes of Vendôme and the Tramouille. These Considerations induced them to think of retreating. In their return, they became masters of Bouchain, the Governor whereof brought him the Keys, though they had no thoughts of attacking the place. Then leaving an English Garrison in Bouchain, they retired into Arris. But presently after, the French recovered that Town. Thus the progress of the confederate Army was not so great as Francis had reason to fear. Had the Army taken the Field sooner, he would have been greatly embarrassed. But, as I said, the hopes the Emperor, and the King of England had conceived of the Duke of Bourbon's undertaking, was the cause of their not beginning the Campaign in any place, till about the end of September.

When Adrian VI came into the League, he had no design to ruin France, in order to compel Francis to wage War with the Turks, but he had been told, it would be a certain means to oblige that Prince to consent to the Truce. Mean while, without the Pope's knowing any thing of it, the Emperor and Henry had combined to invade France, and divide it between them. Probably, if he had lived to the end of this year, he would have seen that their designs did not correspond with his, but he died about six weeks after signing the League against France. He was a good Man, of a Character very different from those of his Predecessors. Instead of thinking to enlarge the Ecclesiastical State by unjust Confiscations, he had given the Duke of Urbino the Investiture of his Duchy. He had done the same by the Duke of Ferrara, knowing that the former Popes had quarrelled with these Princes only to gratify their desire of enriching their own Relations. He would have even restored Modena and Reggio to the Duke of Ferrara, if the clamours of his Council, who could not understand that Justice ought to be the foundation of Policy, had not prevented him. He thought likewise of reforming the Court of Rome, but death suffered him not to execute his design. All these proceedings, so remote from those of his immediate Predecessors, who had used the Courtsiers and People of Italy to see the Popes pursue the loose maxims of Temporal Princes, caused it to be said, that he was indeed an honest Man, and a good Christian, but an indifferent Pope. Accordingly the Italian Writers speak of Adrian VI in Terms importing no great esteem for him.

The beginning of this year, Cardinal Julio de Medici, who retired to Florence upon the death of Leo X., returned to Rome, and was very civilly received. In a short time, he gained the Good-will of the Pope to such a degree, that he supplanted the Cardinal of Volterra, the Prince Daniel* says, Vicesimus was a man of no great credit, and that the Emperor was deceived by him.

Minister, and caused him to be committed to the Castle of St. Angelo. From thence forward he had the sole management of the Pope's affairs, gaining more and more his esteem, by putting on the Devout, and expressing a great Zeal to unite all the Christian Princes against the Turk. By this artifice he led him to publish the Bull for a triennial Truce, and at length to sign the League against France. A Minister like this was, doubtless, too politic for such a Pope. Adrian VI died the 14th of September, at the very time the Armies began to take the Field. Had he lived any longer, he would, without doubt, have perceived, the League he had imprudently engaged in, was by no means proper to procure the Union, he so much desired among the Christian Princes.

Cardinal Wolsey having notice of the Pope's death, writ to the King to inform him of it, desiring his assistance and protection (1). Next day he writ to him again; praying him to recommend him to the Emperor, by a Letter under his own hand. He flattered himself that the Emperor would have a grateful sense of his late Service, in causing the King his Master to declare against France, and would now at least keep his word with him, since he had no Preceptor to be elected as in the former Conclave. But if the Italian Historians are to be credited, the Emperor little thought of procuring him the Papacy, and the Conclave much less, who met presently after Adrian's decease. Of the thirty nine Cardinals which were in the Conclave, Julius de Medici had fifteen, or sixteen at his devotion, besides three who had promised not to be against him, if he was like to succeed in the Conclave; so that he had only seven or eight to gain, in order to have two thirds of the Voices. But this was not easy. Cardinal Colonna, his Adversary, was at the head of a much more numerous Party, who would have infallibly carried it, if the Cardinals of that Faction could have as readily united in choosing a Pope, as in preventing the Election of Julius. This made the Conclave hold fifty days. As for Wolsey, if he had any Cardinals for him, they could not be many, since he had against him the French Party, and the Emperor's Adherents were the same with those of Julius de Medici. In short, Colonna's Faction not agreeing upon the choice of a Pope, because the head would have one elected disagreeable to his Friends, his Indignation at their obliquity caused him to be reconciled with the Cardinal de Medici. Guicciardini says, Julius gave him a promise under his hand to make him his Vice-Chancellor, and present him with his Palace, one of the most magnificent in Rome. Be this as it will, Colonna giving him seven or eight Votes which were at his disposal, there was no further obstacle to his Election. It being reported in the Conclave, that the Cardinal de Medici would be elected the next Scrutiny, most of the Cardinals stayed not till day appeared, but went and made their Court to the person who was soon to be their Master. Their example drew in the rest, who finding it not in their power to hinder the Election, were willing also to shew, they freely concurred. So, that very night, between the 18th and 19th of November, all the Cardinals went and paid obedience to the new Pope, and next morning his Election was confirmed by a solemn Scrutiny, wherein he had all the Voices. Thus it is that the Holy Ghost influenced the Cardinals in the choice of a Pope, who, contrary to their Intention, was to be the cause of the Roman Church's receiving the deepest wound she had ever received. The new Pope assumed the name of Clement VII, on account of St. Clement's day, which was to be very shortly solemnized. He was natural Son of Julian de Medici, Uncle to Leo X. But this defect of Birth, though contrary to the Canons, was not considered. Leo X, who made him Cardinal in the beginning of his Pontificate, took care to have it legally attested, that Julian promised his Mother marriage. So, taking for granted that a bare promise was equivalent to a Marriage, he declared Julius legitimate. Alexander VI took the same course when he made Caspar Borgia his Bastard Son Cardinal. He produced Witnesses, who deposed, that Caspar was born of a married Woman, whence it was inferred the Child was to be deemed the Husband's Son. In this manner did the Vicars of Jesus Christ abuse Laws divine and human to gratify their Passions.

The news of Clement's Election was a great mortification to Wolsey, who, since the promotion of Adrian VI, had expected to be Pope upon the first vacancy. He must have been extremely incensed with the Emperor, who had twice deceived him. So, it may be affirmed, considering his vindictive Temper, he resolved from that moment to be revenged. But as he could not execute this resolution without his Master's assistance, he was to take care not to discover that he acted from a motive of revenge; otherwise he would have run the hazard of being disappointed. He concealed therefore, under the Mask of a feigned moderation, the resentment he harboured in his Breast, and contented himself with telling the King, that several had voted for him in the Conclave, but his absence had turned to his prejudice, and the situation of the affairs of Italy caused the Cardinals to chuse Julius de Medici. A few days after, the King's Ambassador at Rome had orders to notify to the new Pope, the King's and Wolsey's Joy at his promotion (2). At the same time, Wolsey desired the continuance of his Legateship, affirming, that by reason of the King's Prerogative, it was not worth to him a thousand Ducats a year. Clement VII was entirely of the Emperor's Party, and knowing of what consequence the King of England's assistance was at the present juncture of affairs in Europe, gladly embraced the opportunity to gratify Cardinal Wolsey, and make him his Friend, by whose means he might gain the favour of the King his Master. In this disposition, he granted the Cardinal more than he desired. By a Bull of the 9th of January 1524, he gave him the legantine power for Life. This is the first and perhaps the only Instance of a perpetual Legateship.

Wolsey was now raised to the highest point of Grandeur that a Subject can aspire to. He was Archbishop of York, Bishop of Durham, Abbot of St. Albans, Cardinal, Legate a latere for Life, Lord Chancellor of England, Prime Minister and Favorite, carested by the Emperor, respected by the Pope, regarded by all the Princes of Europe, with almost an absolute Power in England, where nothing material was transacted, either in Spirituals or Temporal, but by his sole direction. It is easy to see, so many advantages were but too capable of rendering him proud and insolent. He looked upon the King's Subjects as Slaves, and unfortunately for them, inspired the King by degrees with the same principles, and insinuated to him, that he ought to consider the Parliament only as an Instrument to execute his Will. These Insinuations were but too effectual, as will be seen in the Sequel. In order to render him independent of the Parliament, he persuaded him to exact from his Subjects (3) at once, the Subsidy given by Parliament, and payable in four years. Every one ascribed to the Cardinal this illegal proceeding, which established a very dangerous precedent. But he little regarded the Complaints of the people, since he was secure of the King's Countenance, and the Pope's Protection.

He undertook this very year a thing he would never have ventured upon, had he not been fully satisfied that the Pope could not be without the King's assistance. And that was, to cause several Religious Houses to be suppressed, to appropriate the Revenues to two Colleges, which he intended to found at Oxford and Ipswich. If the Pope had reaped any advantage, his consent would not have been very strange. But that he should agree to the Suppression of several Monasteries to gratify a private Person, is what could hardly be expected, and perhaps had never happened. Accordingly, the Pope would never have granted it, had not the satisfying the Passion of this ambitious Minister been absolutely necessary to his designs. The Cardinal's project was to found a magnificent College at Oxford by the name of Cardinal-College, which was to consist of one hundred eighty six persons, with Salaries. The other College was to be founded at Ipswich, the place of his Birth, but only for Grammar, and to qualify young Scholars for his College at Oxford. But as these Projects were not accomplished this year, I shall speak of them on another occasion, and close the year 1523, with an account of what passed in Scotland, where affairs were no more undisturbed than elsewhere.

Henry being engaged in a war with France, justly dreaded the Diversion the Scots might make on the Frontiers. On the other hand, the King of Scotland's Ministry frequently tempted him to become master of that Kingdom, after the example of Edward III his Predecessor, who dispossessed the King his Nephew at a like juncture. The Factions in Scotland increasing his hopes, he never ceased to foment them by means of his Adherents, who were very numerous, because he had been obliged to give pensions. He used for pretence, his being obliged by nature to take care of the King his Nephew's concerns, who was not of age to distinguish what was advantageous, from what was prejudicial. So, as an affectionate Uncle, he did his endeavour to remove the Duke of Albany, under colour there was danger of that of him to the Princes of the House of Saxony. At the same time he exhorted them to hinder the publication of Luther's German Bible, for fear the Translation should be prejudicial to the Truth. But his Letter had no great effect.

The progress of the Reformation was not yet considerable enough, to be regarded by the chief Sovereigns of Europe, whose thoughts were wholly intent upon War. Clement VII refused to renew the League, though himself had engaged his Predecessor in it, and declared he would stand Neuter. This Declaration at first extremely embarrassed the Duke of Bourbon, because the Emperor not having provided for the payment of his Troops, it was not possible for the Duke to satisfy them, since the Pope and the Florentines withdrew their usual Subsidies. He found means however to draw some Money from the Inhabitants of Milan, and at last persuaded the Pope to give him twenty thousand Ducats, and cause the Florentines to furnish him with fifty thousand, on condition of Secrecy.

Not long after, the Duke of Bourbon receiving a supply of fix thousand Landjourns, and the Venetian Army, under the Command of the Duke of Urbino joining him, he took the Field with thirty-five thousand Men. Mean while, Bonnivet was greatly embarrassed. He had not above twenty thousand Men, having lost the rest of his Army by death or desertion during the last Campaign. But what was worse, he had no Money to pay his Troops. This was a common misfortune to both sides. It is true, he expected ten thousand Swissers, and five thousand Grifons, but foretold they would be of little Service, because he had not wherewithal to content them at their Arrival. This made him resolve to go in quest of the Imperialists and give them battle. But as they were informed of his condition, they determined to avoid it, though they were superior in number, in the expectation of dispersing his Army without engaging. And indeed, the five thousand Grifons, who were coming to join the Admiral, and were advanced as far as Bergamo, not receiving the Money promised them, immediately returned. As for the ten thousand Swissers, they arrived indeed at Jurra, and even advanced to the Banks of the Sesla; but it was not possible to persuade them to continue their march, for want of Money to pay them. Mean while, the Imperialists became matters of several small Towns, which very much annoyed the French Camp, and at last forced the Admiral to retire to Novarra. In the mean time, the Castle of Cremona, which the French had hitherto kept, surrendered to the Imperialists.

his expedition into Provence, he could not however dispense with leaving a good part at Milan, and other places of that Duchy, under the command of Lansy Viceroy of Naples. On the other hand, the Venetians withdrew their Troops, because they had promised by their private Treaty only to defend the Milanese. So, the Duke of Bourbon began his march, the 24th of June, much weaker than he expected (2), and entered Provence the second of July. He presently became master of Aix and some other places, and at last came before Mar-failles, the taking whereof was the chief end of his expedition. But a few days before, Renzo de Cori an Italian Captain in the French Service, had entered with a strong Garrison. Whereupon the Duke thought he should meet with more resistance than he had imagined, but however he opened the Siege.

Mean while Francis I., having intelligence of Bourbon's march, ordered his Forces to be assembled, and some Troops sent to Avignon, for fear the Enemy should seize it. Thence he resolved to assemble his Army, and came himself to command in Person. It is needless to speak either of the Siege of Marfailles, or of the King's great diligence in assembling his Troops. It suffices to say in a word, that the very day he departed from Avignon, in order to fight the Imperialists, namely, the 10th of September, the Duke of Bourbon raised the Siege of Marfailles, and retired into Italy. Whilst the King was at Avignon, he received the news of his Queen's death, who died at Blois in July.

The Duke of Bourbon's retreat entirely changed the face of affairs. Francis I., who had been in danger of losing Provence, saw himself at the head of an Army of above forty thousand Men, ready to be employed in any important undertaking. So, perceiving that the Imperialists took a great compass to retire into Italy, he resolved to improve that advantage, and the superiority of his Army, to recover the Milanese. This resolution being taken, he began his march, and tried to reach Milan before them. On the other hand, the Duke of Bourbon having notice that the King was taking the shortest road to Milan, made incredible speed not to be prevented, perceiving that thereon would depend the preservation of the Duchy. Thus the two Armies marching by different Routes, arrived the same day, one at Alba, the other at Vercelli. A few days after the Duke of Bourbon joined the Viceroy of Naples at Pavia.

Whilst the Imperial Army was in Provence, the Court of England was otherwise disposed than before, and seemed to intend to follow new Maxims. Henry made no diversion in Picardy, though he had paid but one month of the Subsidy he was to give the Duke of Bourbon. This was sufficient to create suspicions in the Emperor, which were confirmed by Henry's unreasonable demand of the Money lent him at his departure from England (3). He could not believe, Henry would demand his Money at so improper a time, instead of performing his own engagements, unless he intended to seek an occasion of quarrel. His uneasiness still increased, upon advice from his Ambassador in England that a Person (4) was come from France to London, from the Duchesse of Angoulême Regent of that Kingdom, and had long and frequent conferences with Cardinal Walpole. All this, added to the Cardinal's revengeful Temper, whom he had vainly amused with hopes of the Papacy, made him justly apprehensive that the King of England was thinking to abandon him and join with his Enemy. However, in the present situation of affairs, there was no other measure to take, since all depended on the success of the War which was going to be renewed in Italy, where his Generals were not a little embarrassed.

As soon as the Duke of Bourbon, and the Viceroy of Naples were joined, they consulted upon what was to be done at so ill a juncture. At first, they resolved to leave strong Garrisons in Pavia and Alexandria, and take refuge in Milan. But the Plague had made such ravage in that City, every thing there was in so great confusion, and Money and Provisions so scarce, that they were forced to desert from their design and abandon Milan. So, having well stored Pavia and Alexandria, they withdrew to Soncina, where Francesco Sforza also repaired with them.

Mean while, Francis I. continuing his March towards Milan, and hearing the Imperialists were retired, caused his Troops to enter the City, and ordered the Castle to be invested. If, instead of going to Milan he had marched directly to the Imperialists, who were little able to withstand him, he would have infallibly dispersed them. But Bonnivet's unfortunate advice induced him not only to march to Milan, which must have fallen into his hands if he had defeated or routed the Imperialists; but also to resolve to besiege Pavia. When he appeared before that place, the Generals of the Imperialists began to take courage, in expectation that the length of the Siege and the Winter-Season, would afford them time to take some measures. Mean while they speedily sent for a Supply of ten thousand Germans. The Pope, the Venetians, and the Florentines failing them all at once, upon the French King's coming into Italy, their only refuge was the length of the Siege of Pavia, which began in November.

Clement VII., who in the late Pontificate had openly declared against the King of France, being in great perplexity, sent a Nuncio to the two Armies to procure a Truce; but not succeeding, he made his Peace with the King of France. Moreover he proposed to him the Conquest of the Kingdom of Naples, and concluded with him a private Treaty, promising free passage to the French Troops.

Presently after, Francis detached five or six thousand Men under the command of the Duke of Albany, who had left Scotland the beginning of the Spring, with orders to march towards Naples. As they were necessarily to pass through the Ecclesiastical State, Clement VII. pretended for some time to oppose it, to make believe it was against his will. When the French were in the middle of his Dominions, he published his agreement with the King of France, as if newly made, and sent the Emperor notice, excusing himself on the necessity and constraint he was under. Though the Emperor was very flegmatick, he could not help showing, on this occasion, an extreme resentment against the Pope. He said, it was solely at the instance of Leo X., that he had undertaken the defense of Italy: That Clement himself had pressed Adrian VI. to sign the League, and now he was become Pope, forsook him in his greatest need, and left him to prosecute alone a War kindled by himself: That however he hoped to come off with honour, and to the confusion of those who so basely deserted him. The event showed however, the Pope had done him signal service, in persuading his Enemy to carry war into the Kingdom of Naples, since he thereby caused him to divide his Forces. But it is uncertain whether the Pope had any such intention.

Another accident further contributed to deprive Francis of his great superiority over his Enemies. Renza de Ceri, who defended Marjelles, having received the King's orders to embark ten thousand Men on the Gallies, and join the Duke of Albany, who expected him in Tuscany, took Savona in his way. This Success which seemed very advantageous for Francis, turned to his real misfortune, as it put him upon sending a fresh detachment to Savona, under the Conduct of the Marquis of Saluzzo, to take against Genoa what advantages should offer. The two detachments for Naples and Savona (1), to weakened the French army, that the Imperialists no longer feared to take the Field, in order to prolong the Siege of Pavia, till the arrival of the German Succours, which the Duke of Bourbon himself was gone to hasten. And indeed, within a few days Pescara became master of Caffiana, a Post very convenient for his purpose. With this event ended the year 1524. But before I proceed to the next, it will be necessary briefly to mention what had passed this year in Scotland.

The Duke of Albany returning into France in May, the Queen-Dowager and the Earl of Arran of the House of Hamilton, advised the young King, who was between thirteen and fourteen years old, to assume himself the reins of the Government. This advice was very interrelated, but James was yet too young to perceive it. He followed it, and summoning the States (2), declared the Authority of the Regent was ended, and for the future all orders were to be received from the King himself. After that, the Queen and the Earl of Arran governed in the King's Name. This Change was not made with universal approbation. The Earls of Lennox and Argyle, concerned to see the Earl of Arran in possession of the Government, under colour of the King's anticipated Majority, sent for the Earl of Angus from France, to support themselves by his Interest, because he was entirely fallen out with the Queen and his Wife. Upon that Lord's arrival, they combined with him, and on pretence of freeing the King from the pretended Captivity, the Queen and the Earl of Arran held him in, levied Troops and took Sterling, after which they marched to Edinburgh where the King was. At their approach, the Queen and the Earl carried the King into the Castle, but as they had not taken care to lay in Provisions, were forced in few days to deliver the King to the three Lords, who assumed the Title of Regents. Thus the King was again put in Guardianship under these three Lords, who agreed to rule in turns, four Months each. The Earl of Angus begun, and as he was in the King of England's interest, sent Ambassadors to treat of the King of Scotland's marriage with the Princess Mary, according to Henry's own Scheme. To facilitate this Negotiation, the Truce which was to expire the 1st of December, was prolonged to the 26th of January 1525.

As England was very quiet during the whole year 1524, the Affairs of that Kingdom will not take me up long. I shall only observe, that Clement VII. finding himself in a very ill Situation between the Emperor and the King of France, shewed great regard for the Court of England, whose assistance, he thought, he might want. To that purpose, he confirmed the King's Title of Defender of the Faith, conferred on him by Leo X. (3), and, to please Cardinal Wolsey, suppressed St. Frideswid's Priory in Oxford, on the ground whereof the Cardinal intended to build his College, and appropriated the Revenues to the new Foundation. But as this was not sufficient for the maintenance of the College, the Cardinal procured power to visit all the Religious Houses, notwithstanding their Immunities, and particularly those of the Franciscans, who pretended to be exempted. This was to make a certain list of such as might be suppressed, in order to transfer the Revenues to his Colleges. The Bull which gave him these powers, was dated the 21st of August. On the 11th of September following, the Pope granted him another Bull, empowering him to suppress as many Monasteries as he pleased to the value of three thousand Ducats a year for the same use (4).

In the beginning of December, Cardinal Laurentius Campejus, who had been the Pope's Legate in Germany, was made Bishop of Salisbury with the King's Consent. We must now return to the Siege of Pavia, to behold an Event which made a very great alteration in the Affairs of Europe, wherein England was deeply concerned (5).

Francis I. still persisted in this Siege, though without making much progress, because of the rigour of the Season, and the Imperial Army, which being posted at Caffiana, annoyed his Convoys very much. Besides, he had made three Detachments, one to besiege the Castle of Milan, another for Naples, and a third for Savona. On the other hand, the Duke of Bourbon came from Germany about the end of January, with a Supply of ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse (6), which made the Imperial Army two and twenty thousand strong. As the Generals wanted Money, and for that reason were not sure of hindering the Army from disbanding, they resolved to attempt the relief of Pavia. To that end, they began to march the 3d of February towards the Town, bent to improve what opportunities should offer. But as the Camp of the Besiegers was strongly intrenched, they waited three weeks before they executed so dangerous a resolution, which might be attended with terrible Consequence. Mean while, the Grisons having recalled their six thousand Men in the French Service, and these Troops departing, notwithstanding all the King's endeavours to detain them (7), the Duke of Bourbon thought he should no longer defer attacking the Enemy's Camp. This resolution was executed the Even of St. Matthias (8), with a Success very fatal to Francis, since his Army was routed, and himself unfortunately taken prisoner (9).

ous Army, whilst the King of England his Ally, had it in his power to give France a mortal wound on the side of Picardy. Consequently, the Balance of Europe being taken away, the Sovereigns, for the most part, had great reason to dread falling at last into Slavery. The Venetians alone perfectly knowing the danger, proposed to the Pope a League against the Emperor, not questioning the King of England would also join in it, because it was his Interest. This League added to the Forces France could fill bring into the Field, and the Supplies which might be received from the Switzers by paying them well, would have been sufficient to keep the Emperor in awe; if it could have been speedily concluded. But the Pope preferring his own Interest to that of Europe in general, halled his Treaty with the Viceroy of Naples, who acted in the Emperor's name. By this Treaty, the Emperor, among other things, was to give the Investiture of Milan to Francesco Sforza. There were also three separate Articles concerning the Pope in particular, namely, 1. That the Inhabitants of the Milanese should furnish themselves with Salt from the Pope's Territories. 2. That the Emperor should compel the Duke of Ferrara to restore to the Church the Town of Reggio, seized after Leo X's death. 3. That the Pope should have the disposal of the Benefices in the Kingdom of Naples. By this Treaty, which was of no force till ratified by the Emperor, the politic Viceroy found means to cause to vanish, or, at least, to defer the project of League against the Emperor, proposed by the Venetians, and to render the other Powers jealous of the Pope. This was the greatest Service he could possibly do his master on this occasion.

Mean while, the Emperor's Generals were greatly embarrassed after so glorious a Victory, for want of Money to pay their Troops. They had indeed received a hundred thousand Ducats from Florence, but that not sufficing to pay the Arrears of the Army, and maintain the Soldiers afterwards, they were forced to disband the best part of the Troops, when by the Treaty with the Pope, they were free of having no League to fear. Besides Trinobis, who was besieging the Castle of Milan, had now repulsed the Alps, and the Duke of Albany was only thinking of retiring into France with his Army. This disbanding of Troops would have been of very great consequence to the Emperor, whose Interest it was to prevent by his moderation the measures which the alarmed States of Italy might take against him, if his Generals had proceeded accordingly. But propriety causing them to be wanting in Policy, they treated the States of Italy, and especially the Venetians, with a haughtiness that gave them occasion to think their Liberty in danger, and made them resolve to use all possible endeavours to avoid the threatened Slavery.

The Emperor could better dissemble his Sentiments. He received the news of the Victory of Pavia, and the French King's Captivity, with great moderation, forbidding any Demonstrations of Joy, and saying, Christians ought to rejoice only for Victories over Infidels. He seemed to sympathize with Francis's misfortune, and, as I may say, to put himself in his place, by acknowledging it to be a mere chance, and no Prince, how brave soever, exempt from the like Accident. Presently after he called his Council to debate what was to be done with the prisoner. His Confessor, who spoke first, was for releasing him without Terms. He represented to him, that by such a generous action, he would not only acquire immortal Fame, but also make the King of France his real Friend, who, not to be out-done in Generosity, would doubtless strive to express his Gratitude: That with his help, he would give Law to Germany and Italy, without being obliged to demand the assistance of other inferior Princes. But the Duke of Alva answered all these Arguments, and concluded it was best to reap from this Victory, all the advantages it could naturally procure; and the Emperor embraced his opinion. This plainly shows, that his pretended moderation was but a disguise to hinder the Princes of Europe from being alarmed, and concerting measures to oppose the execution of his ambitious designs.

To continue this disguise, he sent the Count of Beauremain into Italy with certain Terms, on which he was willing to release his prisoner. He was very sure Francis would not accept them. But it was his Interest to make the World believe it was not his fault that the French King was not released. Wherefore, it was every where indutiously reported, that the Emperor had sent the King very reasonable Terms. But great care was taken not to publish them. Among other things, he demanded for himself the Duchy of Burgundy (1). Moreover, he had a mind to join to the Duke of Bourbon's Territories, Provence and Dauphiny, and erect the whole for that Prince into a Kingdom independent of the Crown of France. Lastly, he demanded that Francis should give the King of England entire Satisfaction, concerning what was due to him. The first of these Conditions in Justice and Equity, contained nothing strange. King Lewis XI took possession of the Duchy of Burgundy, after the death of the last Duke, under colour of a title which was contested, and of which however he made himself Judge. It could not therefore be taken ill, that the Emperor should demand restitution of what was wrested from Mary of Burgundy's Grandmother, at least, till the Cause was legally decided. But what was surprising, and very hard in the Emperor's proposals, was, his desire to establish in the heart of France, an independent Kingdom, to gratify a rebellious Subject, the prime Author of the King's misfortune. Probably, he insisted on this Article only to make the first pass the better, or to give occasion for a Rupture. Francis I, rejected these Conditions with the utmost Indignation (2), and swore, he would rather be a Captive all his Life than accept them (3). But he offered, in his turn, Conditions which he thought very advantageous to the Conqueror, namely, that he would marry Lenora Queen-Dowager of Portugal the Emperor's Sister, and give the Duke of Bourbon his Sister the Duchess of Alençon, who had lately lost the Duke her Husband: That he would agree to hold the Duchy of Burgundy as the Queen Dowager's Dowry, and leave it to their Male Heirs: That he would restore to the Duke of Bourbon, all his confiscated Estates: That he would renounce all claim to Naples and Milan: That he would satisfy the King of England concerning what was due to him: Finally, that he would pay the same ransom as King John, when taken prisoner at the battle of Poitiers. But the Emperor was not satisfied with these offers. He still insisted that the Duchy of Burgundy should be restored to him without Condition. Moreover, he affirmed that Francis had no right to Naples and Milan, and therefore his offer to relinquish it, was needless and chimerical.

It was not without reason that the Emperor persisted in his demands. It is easy to judge the Confirmation of France, after the loss she had lately sustained. The King was a captive, and almost all her Generals taken or slain in the battle of Pavia. The Kingdom being exhausted by continual Wars under this and the former Reigns, was destitute of Men and Money. The Switzers were disheartened. The Canton of Zurich which had refused to furnish the King with Troops for the War, was still in the same disposition from a Principle of Confidence. Zuinglius, who had great Interest in that Canton, persuaded the Senate, that to barter the Blood of their Citizens for Money, and serve the Ambition of Princes, was an infamous thing. But though all the Cantons had been equally inclined to find Troops, it was well known, they would not do it without being paid; and to procure the Money was no easy thing. On the other hand, there was reason to fear, the King of England would improve this opportunity to invade France through Picardy, whilst the Emperor attacked the Provinces bordering upon Spain. In fine, there was nothing to be expected from Italy, since the Pope had made his Peace with the Emperor, it being impossible the Venetians would alone maintain the War for the sake of France. Thus was seen on all sides just cause of alarm. Certainly, had the Emperor and Henry renewed their League, and vigorously attacked France, that Kingdom in its present ill Circumstances, must have been ruined. But at the time the Regent, and all true Frenchmen were under these apprehensions, a ray of hope appeared, which hindered their Courage from sinking entirely. The Pope and the Emperor could not agree together, though outwardly they seemed willing to unite. The Venetians were inclined to join in a League with the other States to oppose the Emperor's progress. In short, the King of England, instead of taking advantage of the King of France's misfortune, generously took his part. On the other hand, Francesco Sforza, seeing himself as it were the Emperor's slave, strove to throw off this Yoke, and, though he miscarried, his attempt however produced a good effect, as it showed the Emperor the disposition of the Princes who entered into this Plot, which it will be necessary to explain, in order to give a distinct Idea of the affairs of those times, wherein England was concerned. But first it must be seen what became of the captive King.

(2) Adding, that it was not in his power to alienate any of the Demains belonging to the Crown of France, without the consent of the Parliament and other sessions vested with the Government of the Kingdom. Ibid.

(3) When the Articles were presented to Francis, he was so affected at them, that he is said in a fury to draw his Dagger and cry, It is better for a King of France to die thus: Upon which Hernando de Alençon who was present hastily took the Dagger from him. Herbert. p. 60.

1525. The unfortunate prisoner was kept in the Castle of Pizzighione till Egler, but with so much uneasiness on the part of the Imperialists, that they durst not remove their Troops from that quarter, for fear of his being rescued. At last, Lansy hearing, the Venetian Ambassador at Rome had frequent Conferences with the Pope, was afraid some plot was forming to deliver the prisoner. Wherefore, without imparting his design to the Duke of Bourbon, whom perhaps he mistrusted, he resolved to convey him into Spain. But this was difficult, since he had no naval Force, and the French Gallies were at Sea. To remove this obstacle, he insinuated to the King, that the only way speedily to obtain his Liberty, was to confer in person with the Emperor: That as the Emperor was a generous Prince, and had shewn a concern for his misfortune, their Interview could not but produce a good effect, and promote a speedy Peace. Francis agreed to it, full of hopes that he should do more himself in two or three Conferences with the Emperor, than his Ministers in many Months. He even lent the Viceroy his Gallies to carry him into Spain, where he arrived about the middle of June.

He flattered himself, he should be treated in Spain as King John was in England: but at his arrival, he had the mortification to be confined in the Castle of Madrid, where the Emperor, instead of treating with him in Person, did not so much as pay him a visit. All he could obtain was a Safe-Conduct for his Sister the Duchess of Alençon, who came to Madrid in September. She was empowered by the Regent her Mother to negotiate with the Emperor. But at last she was forced to return, and nothing obtained. When she came to Madrid, she found the King her Brother so ill, that his recovery was despaired of. As there was no room to doubt, that his Grief at seeing his Liberty so remote, occasioned his Illness, the Emperor posted from Toledo to Madrid, to visit and comfort him, in the apprehension of losing, by his Prisoner's Death, the advantages he expected from his Captivity. He put him therefore in hopes of his Deliverance, in the two visits he made him, tho' in general Terms, which however produced the desired effect, since the King recovered his Health. But when, after his recovery, he would have renewed the negotiation, he quickly perceived he was farther from his deliverance than he imagined. The Emperor still insisted upon the restitution of Burgundy, and when the King offered to espouse the Princess Leonora, and hold that Duchy as her Dowry, Charles excused himself as having promised to give the Queen his Sister in marriage to the Duke of Bourbon. It was no small mortification to Francis to see one of his Subjects preferred before him. But what troubled him still more, was, that he saw it to be only a pretence to retard the Conclusion of the Treaty. So, in the despair the Emperor's rigour threw him into, he gave the Duchess of Alençon a Writing under his hand, whereby he consented and even ordered, that the States of France should crown the Dauphin his Son. This, in France, is called the Edict of Madrid. But the Parliament of Paris thought not fit to record it, either because it was against the Laws of the Realm, or they deemed such an imperfect Edict to be of no Authority since the King was not free. It may be, Francis thereby designed to let the Emperor see, that instead of having a King in his power, he ran the hazard of having only a Prince without Dominions.

Whilst the Emperor amused his Prisoner in Spain, he acted with no greater sincerity with the Pope, who did not know what to think of his Proceedings. The victorious Monarch had courted him very earnestly. But after making a Treaty with him by the Viceroy of Naples, he long delayed to ratify it, and at last had sent his ratification without including the three separate Articles. He said, that as to the Duke of Ferrara he could not oblige him to deliver Reggio to the Pope, being a Fief of the Empire. As to the second Article, whereby the Emperor was bound to oblige the Inhabitants of the Milanese to take their Salt of the Pope's Subjects, he said, that concerned only the Duke of Milan, and for his part he could not promise for others. That for the Benefices of Naples, he could not agree to that Article, unless a limitation was added, which rendered it of no effect, namely, that what had been practised in the Reigns of the former Kings of Naples should be conformed to. The Pope finding, the Emperor refused to ratify these three Articles, would not accept of the ratification, and they both remained upon the same terms as before the Treaty. But the Emperor had obtained his desires, since he had obstructed the League which was projecting against him, in rendering the Pope suspected by the rest of the Sovereigns.

There was another thing which shewed the Emperor's insincerity, namely, having sent the Investiture of Milan to Francis Sforza, he clogged it with the condition that No. XXXIX. Vol. I.

Sforza should pay him twelve hundred thousand Ducats in recompense for his charges in keeping that Duchy for him. As it was evident, Sforza could not possibly perform this Condition, it was no less so that the Emperor only sought a pretence to continue master of Milan. These things alarmed the Pope, who heard besides, that the Council of Spain was not favorable to him. And indeed, some of the Emperor's Ministers had advised him, to chastise the Pope for joining with France at so critical a juncture, and compel him to restore Modena to the Duke of Ferrara, and Bologna to the Bentivoglio's.

On the other hand, the Venetians seeing there was no likelihood, that the Emperor really intended to restore Sforza, could not but be alarmed at his keeping the Duchy of Milan. Wherefore, they used their utmost endeavours to persuade the Pope and the King of England to join with them and France against the Emperor, well knowing that otherwise all Italy would fall under the Dominion of the House of Austria. A Letter of Andrea Gritti their Doge to Cardinal Wesley, of the 31st of March, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, shews, that these able Politicians had formed this project shortly after the Battle. The Letter indeed is only an Ambassador's Credentials, who had orders to treat with the King upon a very important affair. But at such a juncture, this great affair could be only the League they were projecting.

Mean while, the Pope was extremely embarrassed. In attempting to manage too artfully, he had made for many false Steps, that he knew not which way to turn. This is frequently the case of those, who, quitting the great road, walk thro' by-ways. Clement VII could not resolve either to be satisfied with the Emperor's offers, or enter into a League against him. In this uncertainty, he chose to follow the example of Leo X, and Julius II, his Predecessors, that is, to treat with the Emperor and his Enemies at the same time, in order to be determined by the Events, in what would be most advantageous. To that end, whilst he was treating at Rome with the Venetians, he sent Cardinal Salviati to Spain, to negotiate with the Emperor, putting into his hands a Dispensation, desired by that Monarch, to marry his Niece Isabella of Portugal. But the Dispensation was not to be delivered to the Emperor till after the conclusion of the Treaty.

The affairs of Italy being in this situation, another accident happened, which plainly shewed the Emperor only sought to amuse all the Sovereigns by a feigned moderation, whilst in truth he was solely thinking of extending his Dominions. His League with Adrian VI, and the rest of the States of Italy, was founded upon Francesco Sforza's restoration to the Duchy of Milan. As this was the common Interest of Italy, so was it likewise the only Bond by which the Emperor had found means to unite all the Potentates against France, then in possession of the Milanese. That League had succeeded according to the desires of the Allies. The French were driven out of Italy, and Sforza restored. But though the Emperor had pretended to give him the Investiture, he had not yet done it, because Sforza was not able to pay the twelve hundred thousand Ducats he demanded. He was wade to hope he should obtain more moderate Terms, but that was only to amuse him, and remove his as well as the Pope's and Venetians Suspicion, that the Emperor intended to keep the Duchy for himself, or give it to his Brother the Archduke Ferdinand.

What was then but a bare Suspicion, soon became a Certainty. The Duke of Bourbon going into Spain, to take care of his Concerns, Ferdinand d'Avalos, Marquis of Pescara, was commissioned by the Emperor to command in Italy. Shortly after, Pescara affected to appear very dissatisfied, and openly to complain of the Emperor's Ingratitude. He carried his dissimulation so far, that at last he inspired Jeronimo Morone, the Duke of Milan's Chancellor, with the boldness to found him, to see whether by his means the Spaniards might be driven out of the Milanese. Pescara hearkened to his Insinuations, had several Conferences with him, and managed so dextrously, that he engaged Morone to cause the Duke himself to speak to him about the affair. Morone's project was to kill all the Spaniards in the Duchy of Milan, and make Pescara King of Naples. As this could not be effected without foreign Aid, Pescara proposed to engage in the plot, the Pope, the Regent of France, and the Venetians. Accordingly these three Powers came into it, and promised their assistance. When matters were almost ripe, Pescara received the Emperor's orders to dispossess the Duke of Milan entirely. He began with seizing Morone, and then constrained the Duke, who was not able to resist, to resign the City of Milan, and all the rest of the Towns in his possession. Only the Castle of Milan Sforza would not deliver, which was therefore immediately besieged. Thus the Emperor had a plausible colour to ren-

The artifice practised by the Emperor to seize the Milanese, served only to confirm the Venetians in their resolution, to hazard all to hinder that Duchy from remaining in the hands of the House of Austria. Without troubling themselves to justify their Conduct, they plainly told the Spanish Ambassador, who pressed them to join with the Emperor, that Sforza's restoration was a preliminary they would never depart from. If Clement VII had shewn the same resolution, the Emperor would have been something embarrassed. But the Pope, by acting too politically, suffered himself to be deceived, as he had been before. He had a Legate in Spain, who was treating with the Emperor, whilst himself was negotiating at Rome with the French and Venetian Ambassadors, a League against that Monarch. He impatiently waited the Success of his Legate's Negotiation, and as the conclusion was long delayed, he appointed a day to sign a League with France and Venice. But in the interval, receiving advice, that his Treaty was concluded at Madrid, he would hear no more of the League. Soon after, the Emperor sent him by an Express, the Treaty concluded in Spain, which he found to be equivocal and ambiguous, that he refused to ratify it. The Spanish Ambassador pretending to be himself surprized at the ambiguities of the Treaty, strenuously maintained, they were undefined, and told the Pope, he might draw the Treaty as he pleased, and engaged to have it signed by the Emperor within two months. This delay was only to hinder the Pope from entering into the League during that time, and Clement suffered himself to be deceived by the assurance wherewith the Ambassador spoke. This was transacted in December 1525, and in the same month died Pefcara.

Having thus shewn the situation of affairs in Italy, we must see what passed at the Court of England, where was no less caballing than at Rome and Venice, since it was then really debating to preserve the Balance of Europe, which leaned too much to one side. The equality between the two Houses of France and Austria, was properly what made England considerable, and consequently was an advantage not to be neglected. But there were other reasons that incited Henry to forsake the Emperor, and join with France. Though the Treaty of Bruges or Windsor seemed to have inseparably united the Emperor and Henry, it is however certain, they were not pleased with one another, because each was desirous to make their Union subservient to his own affairs, without any regard to his Ally. Probably Cardinal Wolsey, who was very angry with the Emperor, did not a little contribute to dispose his matter to a rupture.

The Princess Mary, Henry's Daughter, was affianced to the Emperor, and yet the King her Father had offered her to the King of Scotland. On the other hand, the Emperor had not scrupled to conclude his own Marriage with Isabella of Portugal, as if he had not been engaged to Mary, and from hence these two Monarchs shewed they had very little regard for one another. Charles hearing that Henry was treating of a Marriage between his Daughter and the King of Scotland, took that occasion to throw upon him the rupture of his Marriage. In March (1) he sent into England the Lord of Buren, and the President of the Council of Meclin, to require the King to send him immediately the Princess, pay down the covenanted Dowry, and pursuant to their League, enter Picardy with a powerful Army, as he should have done the last year. It was easy for Henry to perceive, the Emperor sought only to justify himself, without any intention to accomplish his Marriage with Mary, and this way of proceeding was not very proper to preserve a good Understanding. But on the other hand, the Emperor had no less reason to complain of him. Henry had promised to find a hundred thousand Crowns a month for the Duke of Bourbon's Expedition into France, or to make a powerful Diversion in Picardy. But after setting the affair on foot by the first monthly payment, he had stopped there without making any attempt against France. Nay, he had demanded the Money due to him, when he knew the Emperor was not able to pay him. This proceeding seemed to demonstrate he only sought a pretence. Moreover the Emperor was informed, that in October last, when Francis I was marching into Italy, a person without Character (2) came to London, from the Regent, and had several Conferences with Cardinal Wolsey. But then Charles had promised to invade France on the side of Spain, without having done any thing towards it. And yet he took it very ill that Henry should disappoint him. Thus these two Monarchs who were thought to be strictly united, and whose Union made France and Italy tremble, were in reality estranged from one another, and ready to quarrel. In all appearance, the Conferences of the person from France with Cardinal Wolsey, had taken effect. Besides, the Cardinal who was very revengeful, must have been extremely incensed with the Emperor for deceiving him twice, after a positive promise to help him to the Papacy.

It was in the beginning of March that the Emperor's two Ambassadors discharged their Commission. But before they had received an answer, the news of the Battle of Pavia, and the taking of the King of France reached England (3), by a Letter from the Governors of Flanders, with another from Lanoy, written on the very day of the Battle. As the Court of England then stood inclined, this news was by no means agreeable. Nevertheless as it was yet necessary to dissemble, Henry ordered a solemn Mass to be celebrated at St. Paul's, where he was pleased to be present in Person (4), without however causing Te Deum to be sung (5). His aim was to make the Emperor's Ambassadors believe, it was on account of the Victory, and withal to shew a regard for France, by avoiding to express any Joy at her misfortune.

Some days after, the Council was assembled to consider what was to be done at this juncture. The question was, whether this opportunity should be embraced to make Conquests upon France, in prosecuting the King's Title to that Kingdom, or whether it was more expedient to assist and preserve France entire, and oppose the growing power of the House of Austria. As to the first point, it is certain, if on this occasion, England had strictly united with the Emperor, and made vigorous efforts on the side of Picardy, France, in her present condition, would have been irrecoverably lost. For, instead of being able to withstand the Arms of these two powerful Enemies, it was not possible for her to resist the Emperor without the King of England's assistance. But on the other hand, it was considered, that France could not be ruined without rendering the Emperor too powerful: That he was already in possession of Spain, and had also an eye upon Portugal, by marrying his Niece Isabella as it was publicly reported: That his late Victory in Milan gave him such a superiority in Italy, that probably, the Pope and the Venetians would not be able to make head against him: That he possessed almost all the Low-Countries with large and rich Provinces in Germany; not to reckon the Imperial Dignity which was become as Hereditary in his Family: That if by a powerful diversion, an opportunity was given him to conquer the French Provinces bordering upon Spain and Italy, the most the King could expect was, to share France with him: But it was to be feared, that afterwards the Emperor would become his Enemy, and the more formidable, as there would be no proportion between their Forces, nor any State in Europe capable of supporting the weakest: That therefore, supposing the King had in France all the success he could wish, in aggrandizing himself in that Kingdom, he would only be involved for the future in an unequal War with the Emperor, who very probably would never be satisfied till he had dispossessed the English of their Conquests: That what had passed between Louis XII and Ferdinand, in respect of the Kingdom of Naples, was a clear evidence how difficult it is for such Partitions long to subsist: That upon all these accounts, it was more for the interest of England, to make a vigorous effort to support France, and enable her to be always a balance to the power of the House of Austria: That the happiness and glory of England consisted in the equality between the King of France and the Emperor, since thereby England was always in condition to remain Arbitrator of Europe, and make herself courted by both sides: That there was no other way to cause Trade to flourish, where-in consisted all her strength, and without which the English could never hope to render themselves formidable: That if, on the contrary, it was resolved to compleat the destruction of France, and a War should afterwards happen with the Emperor, of which there was great probability; at once would be lost the Trade with France, Spain, Italy, Flanders, Germany, which would quickly reduce England to extreme poverty: That at least, it would thereby be out of her power to have Land and Sea Forces sufficient to balance the Emperor's power. In short, if France came to be divided between the Emperor and the King, Scotland would certainly join in Alliance with the Emperor, and continue to annoy England by 1525. frequent diversions as she had always done in favor of France. To these considerations another of greater weight was added, namely, that a League with the Emperor to conquer France was not the same thing, as one with the Regent in defence of that Kingdom: That in the first the Emperor's sole aim would be to make the English Forces serve to enable him to push his Conquests elsewhere; but at the same time he would oppose directly or indirectly the King's increase of power: That this was the usual policy of Princes when they joined with those weaker than themselves: That it could be the less doubted that the Emperor would follow this maxim, as even before the Battle of Pavia, he had shewn, that he considered the King only as his Instrument to promote his designs in Italy; but if the King joined with France, the two Allies having the same view, would as is usual in defensive Leagues act unanimously: That on the other hand, in the present juncture, France not being able to support herself without the assistance of England, would readily accept what terms should be imposed upon her, which was an advantage more real and certain than any to be expected from the Invasion of that Kingdom: In a word, nothing could be more glorious for the Kingdom, than to relieve France in her distress and free her captive King: That by so doing he would truly acquire the Title of Arbitrer and Deliverer of Europe, and make of the King of France a Friend, who probably would eternally remember such a favour.

The were the reasons that induced the King and Council to take part with France. They were perfectly agreeable to the King's and the Cardinal's inclinations, and to the measures they had now begun to take. The only business was to seek a pretence to break with the Emperor, by throwing upon him the blame of the rupture. This is a thing to which Princes are very attentive. When they wage never so unjust Wars, they would persuade the World that Justice and Equity are on their side, without any motive of envy, jealousy, ambition and avarice. The War Henry was meditating against the Emperor was, as we have seen, wholly founded upon policy. And that would have been sufficient to justify it. But he chose rather to ground it upon the pretended injuries received from the Emperor. The reason of this conduct is evident. It seldom happens that Policy and Equity agree, and Henry, like most Princes, had rather be counted a great Politician, than an honest Man. However this be, the resolution being taken to support France, Cuthbert Tunstall, Bishop of London, and Sir Robert Wingfield were sent into Spain, to demand of the Emperor several things which it was known he would not grant. First, That as the War was made at a common charge, it was reasonable the King of England should partake of the Fruits of the Victory of Pavia. That therefore, pursuant to their Alliance, it should be stipulated in the Treaty with the captive King, that Henry should be restored to what belonged to him in France. Secondly, That if this could not be obtained by fair means, the Emperor, according to the Treaty, should prepare to invade France from Spain, whilst the English acted in Picardy, and that the War should not cease till the King of England had acquired all that belonged to him: That the Emperor ought to be the reader to assist the King of England in obtaining his desires, because by his Manage with the Heiress of England, all these acquisitions would finally devolve to him. Thirdly, That as it was laid in the Treaty of Windsor, the two Allies should mutually deliver all Usurpers upon each other's right, Henry required, pursuant to that Article, that the King of France should be delivered to him the same day the Princess Mary was conveyed to the Emperor.

These demands were for the most part of such a nature, that the Emperor easily perceived, Henry only sought a pretence to break with him. Indeed, he could not receive the Princefs Mary, since he was determined to marry Isabella of Portugal, and much less would he deliver the captive King, so part with the advantage he expected from his Victory. Having therefore framed his Answer in general terms, denoting his unwillingness to grant what was demanded, he afforded Henry the pretence he was seeking to join with the Regent of France. When this resolution was divulged, the Court of England took care to publish the reasons of the rupture with the Emperor. They were briefly these: That the Governours of the Low-Countries, instead of providing for the War her quota of Forces, had privately treated with France: That the Flemings had broken the Treaty of Commerce in federal Articles (1): That the Emperor had not paid the King the Sums due to him: That in the Terms on which he had offered to relocate the King of France, he had very negligently and in general only mentioned Henry's right, as a thing of little moment: That he was now treating of his marriage with the Princess of Portugal, in contempt of the Princess Mary, to whom he was contracted. Lastly, That the Turks being about to invade Christendom (2), it was necessary that all Christian Princes should join their Forces against them, which could not be done without a general Peace, but this Peace could not be effected, whilst the Emperor remained in arms to aggrandize himself at the expence of other Princes. These are the reasons alleged in vindication of the King's conduct. But the true reason was the just jealousy with which the Emperor's power inspired England, and the rest of Europe. However, Henry did not think proper to proclaim War against the Emperor, being unwilling by so rash a step, to prejudice his intended Treaty with France. He contented himself with ordering his Ambassadors in Spain, to intercede in his name, in behalf of the captive King, though he expected little from this intercession. Mean while, he acquainted the Regent of France, that if Embassy of France to London would send Ambassadors to treat with him, there might follow a Treaty advantageous to the King her Son, and to both Kingdoms. The Regent immediately appointed XIV. p. 37 Jean-Jacobin de Passieu Lord of Vaux, the same that had begun the Negotiation with Cardinal Wolsey, and Jean Hollingh. Brimon President of Rouen. Their Commission was dated at Lyons, June the 9th.

Whilst the Treaty between France and England was negotiating at London, Henry, knowing how it would end, committed the raising of Money to Cardinal Wolsey's care. The most natural way was to apply to the Parliament. But Wolsey was too haughty to expose himself to a refusal, or contest with the House of Commons, as it had once before happened. So, referring to use a specier means, and more agreeable to his temper, he granted Commissions in the King's name (3), to levy throughout the Kingdom the sixth part of every Lay-Man's Goods, and the fourth of the Clergy's (4). These Commissions were no sooner published, but the Nation was in a great fermentation. This method of raising Money was universally deemed a manifest breach of Magna Charta, and an Incroachment of so great consequence, that there was like to have been a general Rebellion. The King being informed of it, immediately issued out a Proclamation, disavowing these Commissions which had been published in his name, and declaring he would exact nothing of his People by force, nor demand any thing but by way of Benevolence, as practised in the Reign of Edward IV. But it was quickly perceived, this was only an Artifice to extort, under another name, what the People refused to give by force. For, the Benevolence demanded afterwards by the King was almost equal to what was at first required by way of Authority. The Londoners being taxed first, the Magistrates excused themselves, as Benevolences were abolished by Richard III. The Cardinal exclaimed against it, as if it had been the most extravagant assertion in the World. He told them Richard III. was a Tyrant and Uurper, and therefore Laws made in his Reign could not limit the Sovereign's power. But as this Argument had no great effect, he sent for the chief of the Common Council of the City one by one to intimidate them, desiring, at any rate, to compass his ends, without being obliged to call a Parliament. But whilst he was thus employed, there was an Insurrection near London (5), which probably, would have drawn in the whole Kingdom, if a timely stop had not been put to it. The speedy course it took was taken to disperse the seditious, succeeded as the Court could wish. They who had taken Arms seeing themselves not yet sufficiently supported, submitted to the King's mercy, and some of the Ring-Leaders were imprisoned (6). The King finding how the Nation stood affected, thought proper to satisfy them by shewing he was not concerned in the violent proceedings of his Minister. Wherefore he declared in full Council, that his intention was not to punish any Person for this Commotion. The Cardinal perceiving, the King threw all the blame upon him, vindicated himself as well as he could, without

If such an excuse were admitted, it would be no longer necessary for a King of England to apply to the Parliament for Money. The Judges being appointed by the King, it would not be difficult for him to have their opinion on his side. But though there have been Judges so hardy as to decide points of this consequence, as in the Reigns of Richard II, Charles I, James II, very few escaped the punishment due to their presumption. The Parliament never intended that the privileges of the Nation should depend upon the decision of the Judges. The Council finding the King was not inclined to support what the Cardinal had done, and on the other hand, not daring to come upon the Cardinal himself, thought fit to throw all the fault, without naming any Person, upon those that had given the King wrong information, and to release the Prisoners, after a severe reprimand. Pursuant to this resolution, the Prisoners being brought before the Council, the Cardinal sharply rebuked them, aggravating the heinousness of their offence, and adding that the King was pleased to grant them his pardon, provided they would find Sureties for their good behavior for the future. But the Prisoners replying, they could find none, the Cardinal and Duke of Norfolk said, they would be bound for them; whereupon they were discharged.

The Affairs ends mildly.

Herbert Hall.

Henry receives several Complaints against the Cardinal, Herbert Hall.

He is like to turn him out of favour. The Cardinal opposes him.

The King's Letter to the Cardinal, Herbert p. 67.

When the King had discovered that he approved not all the Cardinal's actions, People ventured more boldly to complain of his conduct. The truth is, he oppressed the Nation, and more especially the Clergy, in a strange manner. The instrument of his oppressions was one Allen (1) his Chaplain, who kept no measures, well-knowing his Master's protection would not fail him on occasion. Mean while, how great soever the Cardinal's power was, a private Person ventured to commence a suit against Allen, and prosecuted him so vigorously, that at last the affair came to the King's knowledge, who was informed at the same time of several other complaints of the People. He had hitherto fancied, there had never been in England so mild a Government as his, being ignorant of the ill use Wolsey made of his Authority. This information threw him into so terrible a rage, that the Cardinal was like to have been entirely out of favor. It was not without the utmost submission that he appeased the King's anger, shewing him withal his last Will, wherein he had made him his Heir. This he did to intimate that he was labouring for him, and that the outrages he committed were only to increase the inheritance the King was one day to enjoy. Nothing can more fully express the King's sentiments concerning him, than his Letter to the Cardinal after having pardoned him. A fragment whereof inserted by Lord Herbert in his History, is as follows:

"As touching the matter of Wilton (2), seeing it is in no other strain than you write of, and you being also so suddenly (with the falling sick of your Servants) afraid, and troubled; I marvel not that it over-slipped you as it did. But it is no great matter, standing the case as it doth; for it is yet in my hand, as I perceive by your Letter, and your default was not so great, seeing the Election was but conditional. Wherefore, my Lord, seeing the humbleness of your submission, and though the case were much more heinous, I can be content for to remit it, being right glad, that according to mine intent, my monitions and warnings have been benignly and lovingly accepted on your behalf, promising you, that the very affection I bear you caused me thus to do. As touching the help of Religious Houses to the building of your College, I would it were more, so it be lawfully; for my intent is none, but that it should so appear to all the World, and the occasion of all their mumbling might be secluded and put away; for, surely there is great murmuring of it throughout all the Realm, both good and bad. They say not that all that is ill-gotten is bestowed upon the College, but that the College is the cloak for covering all mischief. This grieveth me, I assure you, to hear it spoken of him, which I so entirely love. Wherefore, methought I could do no less, than thus friendly to admonish you. One thing more I perceive by your own Letter, which a little methinketh toucheth conscience, and that is, that you have received Money of the Exempts for having of their old Visitors. Surely, this can hardly be with good Conscience. For, and they were good, why should you take Money? And if they were ill, it were a sinful Act: Howbeit, your Legacy herein might, peradventure, apud Homines, be a Cloak, but not apud Deum. Wherefore, you, thus admonished by him who so entirely loveth you, I doubt not, will desist, not only from this, (if Conscience will not bear it) but from all other things which should tangle the same; and, in so doing, we will sing, Te laudant Angeli atque Archangeli, Te laudat Omnis Spiritus: And thus an end I make of this, though rude, yet loving Letter, desiring you as benevolently to take it, as I do mean it, for I ensue you, (and I pray you think it so) that there remaineth, at this hour, no spark of displeasure towards you in my Heart. And thus fare you well, and be no more perplex. Written with the hand of your loving Sovereign and Friend,

HENRY R.

This Letter shews the King was informed of several of the Cardinal's misdemeanours. But he did not yet thoroughly know him, his affection for him combating in his Heart the heinousness of his proceedings, and making him believe, that his faults were the pure effects of his great Zeal for the founding of his College. Had he not been thus prepossessed in his favour, he might have been more fully informed. But it was very dangerous to speak directly against a Favorite, to whom the King still shewed so great kindness. Mean while, the Cardinal finding by this instance, what his Enemies would be capable of doing against him, if they had the King's Ear, was very careful to remove from Court all he suspected. At the same time, he strove to preserve the King's Love and Esteem, by all sorts of Condescensions. He had now built at Hampton-Court a stately Palace, which outshone in beauty all the King's Houses. But what had lately happened convincing him it might breed a Jealousy in the King, he made him a present of it (3), as if from the very first he had intended to build it for him. He meant to insinuate by this Present, that he heaped up riches purely for his sake, which succeeded accordingly. The King had the same Confidence in him as before, which the murmurs of the people seemed to have something altered. This Friendship year he obtained the King's Letters Patents for founding his College at Oxford.

About the same time, the King created Henry Fitz-Roy his natural Son Duke of Richmond and Somerset, and High-Admiral of England, though he was but six years old (4). As he had no legitimate Son, he was extremely fond of this bastard, whom he had by the Lady Elizabeth Blunt (5). Whilst these things passed, the Cardinal was employed in treating with the French Ambassadors. The beginning of June the Regent had sent general full Powers to her two Ambassadors. But in the course of the Negotiation they found they should have occasion for more particular Powers, to settle the Sums due from the King of France to the King of England, and which, consisting of several Articles, were to be put into one according to Henry's Intention. These new Powers were dispatched the 16th of August. Upon such an extraordinary occasion, the French Ambassadors had properly nothing to do but to comply with the King of England's pleasure. Their aim being to disengage him from the Emperor, and cause him to join with the King their master, there was no disputing upon the Terms. But it must be confessed, that on this occasion

Desc.* This Allen, who is said by Hall to have been a Man of more Learning than Virtue, or good Conscience, was commissioned by the Cardinal, in consequence of his Legatine Power, to visit all religious Houses; and accordingly he rid from one religious House to another, with a great Train, in a kind of perpetual Progress or Visitation, and did the Cardinal no little Service. Hall, fol. 148. Herbert, p. 67.

(2) This matter of Wilton was this: The Cardinal had elected a Person Priores of the Nunnery there, for whom the King had some way previously expressed his dislike. The Priores of the Nunnery of Wilton was a Baroness by her Title, as were also those of Shaftsbury, Berkim, and St. Mary's in Windsor, which were the only ones that were so in England. See Fishes List, Wolp. p. 398.

(3) And the King, in exchange, permitted him to live in his Palace at Richmond: At which, it seems, the People were highly offended. See Hall, fol. 144.

He was constituted likewise Lieutenant General beyond the Frent, and Warden General of the Marches of Scotland. After which he was bred up with Henry Earl of Surrey at Windsor, from whence they went both together to Italy at Paris. There Fitz-Roy was educated by the Duke's marrying Mary the Earl's Sister, Daughter to Thomas Duke of Norfolk, by whom he had no issue. He was very perceptive and of great expectation, and for abilities of Mind and Body, one of the rarest of his time. 1525. fion, Henry behaved with uncommon Generosity. Though he might have demanded Towns, and even Provinces, in return for the Friendship he was pleased to contract with Francis I. and for the Charges he was going to be engaged in, he contented himself with securing, by new Treaties, the Sums that were justly due to him. These Treaties being ready, were signed at Moore, a House of the Kings (1), on the 30th of August.

Lastly, by a fifth Treaty it was agreed, that the Court of France should consent neither directly nor indirectly, that the Duke of Albany should return into Scotland during the minority of James V.

All these several Treaties, which properly were only different Articles of one and the same Treaty, were ratified and sworn by the Regent of France (5), and confirmed by the Parliaments of Paris, Toulouse, and Bordeaux. The Lords and Cities that were to be Secured, gave their Bonds. Finally, Francis I. himself sent a ratiſication under his own hand, and dated the 27th of December.

But after having done the King's affairs, the Cardinal forgot not himself. There is in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the Regent's Bond of the 15th of November, to pay the Cardinal the Arrears of the Pension granted him in lieu of the Administration of the Bishoprick of Tournay, being four years and a half, amounting to the Sum of twenty nine thousand seven hundred and sixty three Crowns of Gold de franc (?). Moreover, he declared, that for several other weighty reasons, there was due to the Cardinal a hundred thousand Crowns of Gold, these two Sums making together one hundred and twenty one thousand, eight hundred and ninety eight Crowns de franc, were to be paid in seven years, by half yearly equal payments.

The definitive League between France and England being thus concluded and signed, the Regent Henry being a little more at ease, and better able to devote upon the Terms of the King her Son's Liberty. Besides, he had reason to hope, the King of France's Declarations would help to determine the Pope and Venetians, whose tears alone hindered them from forming a League against the Emperor. And indeed, it will hereafter be seen, he ordered their measures upon hearing what the King of England had done. Mean while, the Emperor receiving advice of the Treaty of Moore, recalled his Ambassadors, who were still in England (7). And Henry did the same with respect to his in Spain. Shortly after, Charles concluded his Marriage with Ishabella of Portugal, by virtue of a Dispensation brought him by Carolina Salviati, who delivered it to him after the Conclusion of the forementioned Treaty.

Whilst the affairs of Europe took a new turn, by the effects of the battle of Pavia, and the French King's Captivity, there was no other alteration in the list of Scots, except that the Earl of Angus, who was to hold the Admiration but four months, did not think fit to resign when his time was expired. Whereupon the Earl of Angus and his wife were greatly dissatisfied, but the Earl of Lennox, though likewise displeased, still remained at Court. Meanwhile, the Queen and the Earl of Arran, who had been dispossessed, were not unmindful of their Affairs. The Earl of Lennox's discontent giving them room to hold Intelligence with him, they persuaded him to inflill into the King a desire to be freed from the Earl of Angus. But as there was occasion for great precaution to deceive that Lord's Vigilance, it was not till the next year that the King found an opportunity to attempt the execution of his design.

In the beginning of the year, the Court of Scotland had sent an Embassy to England, at the head whereof was the Earl of Caffis, to treat of the King's Marriage with the Princess Mary. But as several difficulties occurred, the Truce which was to expire the 26th of January, was prolonged to the 23d of March (8), to give the Earl of Caffis time to take a Journey to Scotland for new Instructions. Mean while, it was not possible to conclude any thing, because, in all appearance, Henry had no intention to give his only Daughter and Heir to the King of Scotland. Indeed, it does not appear what advantage could be reaped by this Marriage. Besides, as he then intended to join with France, it was no longer his Interest to manage the Scots (9).

Before the Treaty of Moore was concluded, the Em- 1526.

By restoring Sforza to Milan, he was almost sure the Pope and Venetians would abandon France, and by desisting from his demand of the Duchy of Burgundy, he could be certain Francis would readily resign Milan, and not trouble himself much with the concerns of Italy. But he could not resolve to do either, and that made the Negotiations so tedious. After the Treaty of Moore was signed, the State of his affairs was changed.

The Pope refused to aid Sforza without Sforza's Restoration, Guicciard.

The Pope was grown more courageous, and finding himself deceived by the Emperor, who in a second ratification of their Treaty, left the restoration of Sforza in a state of uncertainty, plainly told him, that without the restitution of the Milanese, there was no Peace to be expected. The Emperor had also reason to fear, that Francis I, seeing himself like to be so well supported, would be still more incontinent with respect to Burgundy. So, perceiving there was no way to prevent a League which was going to unite so many Princes against him, he was in great perplexity. There was a necessity of speedily resolving either to maintain, without any Ally, the impending War, or to make Peace with France. Both were equally perplexing. In chusing War, he knew not where to find Money, and in making with his prisoner a forced Peace, he could not expect to reap from his Victory the advantages he proposed. Happily for him, Francis, tired of his Captivity, freed him from this perplexity, by offering to resign the Duchy of Burgundy, which had hitherto been the main obstacle to a Peace. After that the Emperor readily and seriously treated with him, whereas before he had only amused him. Shortly after, they concluded together the famous Treaty of Madrid. The chief Articles to which Francis submitted were these; besides many others which it would be needless to recite.

The Emperor refused upon a Peace, Haubert.

Treaty of Madrid, Jan. 14, 1526. Act. Pub. XIV. p. 208. Herault, Guicciard, Hall.

That the King of France should marry Queen Leonora the Emperor's Sister, and have with her two hundred thousand Crowns of Gold.

That Francis should be released on the 10th of March, and the same day should deliver to the Emperor his two Sons in Hostage (1).

That he should resign to the Emperor the Duchy of Burgundy in full Sovereignty.

That he should desist from the Homage, the Emperor owed him for Flanders and Artois.

That he should renounce all claim to Naples, Milan, Aiti, Tournay, Lisle, and Hesdin, &c.

That he should perjure Henry d'Albret to resign the Kingdom of Navarre to the Emperor, or at least should give him no assistance.

That, within forty days, he should restore the Duke of Bourbon and all his Party to their Estates.

That he should restore Philibert de Châlons Prince of Orange, and Michael Antonio de Saluzzo, to their Principalities.

That he should give no sort of assistance to the Duke of Guelders, and after that Prince's death, should use his best endeavour to cause his Towns to fall into the Emperor's hands.

That he should pay the King of England five hundred thousand Crowns which the Emperor owed him.

That when the Emperor went to Italy to receive the Imperial Crown, he should lend him twelve Gallies, four large Ships, and a Land-Army, or two hundred thousand Crowns instead of the Army.

Lastly, he promised upon the Word and Honour of a Prince, to execute all these Articles, or in case of Non-performance to return prisoner into Spain.

State of the Emperor's Affairs at the time of the Treaty of Madrid.

If Francis had not been so hasty to offer the Duchy of Burgundy, he would, probably, have saved himself many troubles, and avoided reproaches which much concerned his honour (2). At the time, the Treaty of Madrid was concluded, Charles was under very great perplexities. Besides those already mentioned, he knew that the Princes and Hans-Towns of Germany, that had embraced Luther's Doctrine, began to take measures to secure themselves from the Calamities they were daily threatened with. To this was added, the dread of a Turkish Invasion in Hungary, which greatly concerned the Emperor, by reason of the neighbourhood of Austria. So, in all likelihood, if Francis had not been so hasty, the Emperor would have rather desisted from Burgundy, than been exposed to so many Enemies at once. These were the real motives that obliged him to hasten the Conclusion of the Treaty of Madrid, contrary to the Instances and Opposition of many of his Counsellors, who represented to him, that he would be infallibly disappointed. His Chancellor even refused to sign it, but as he believed he had strong reasons to run that hazard, he absolutely concluded, in a belief, that it was the sole means to prevent the League against him. Whatever happened, he hoped to be free at last, by restoring Sforza to Milan, which however he did not intend to do but at the last extremity. Mean while, by resolving to insist upon that Article, he rendered all his measures ineffectual; he lost his prisoner, without obtaining Burgundy, or preventing the League; in short, after sustaining many attacks, he was, as will be seen, forced to part with the Duchy of Milan. But where is the Prince, let his abilities be never so great, that can foresee all the Consequences of his own Policy? When Charles V signed the Treaty of Madrid, he imagined to do a very advantageous thing. Indeed Francis would have dearly purchased his Liberty, if, when he signed the Treaty, he had really intended to keep it. But it is too manifest, that when he gave his word, he designed to break it, since he had no sooner set foot in his own Dominions, but he refused to ratify the Treaty. This was so little expected by the Emperor, that immediately after the Conclusion of the Peace, he wrote to the Pope, that though he had promised to restore Sforza to Milan, it was however on condition that Sforza cleared himself of the Crime of Felony and Treason laid to his charge. Adding, that since the Princes of Italy withed, he would not give the Duchy of Milan to the Archduke Ferdinand his Brother, he would present it to the Duke of Bourbon, in case Sforza was found guilty. Clement VII, being informed of the Conditions of the Treaty of Madrid, presently guessed that Francis had accepted of them only to obtain his release, without intending to perform them. In this belief, he still insisted upon Sforza's restoration without Terms, being willing, before he engaged with the Emperor, to see what the King of France would do. The Senate of Venice being of the same mind, not a little contributed to keep the Pope in his resolution.

What these subtle Politicians had foreseen, came to pass, Francis was no sooner arrived in his own Territories, but he mounted a Turkish Horse and rid full speed to St. John de Luz, from whence he went next day to Bayonne. The 17th of March, he signed Bonds to the King of England for the Sums in which his Mother the Regent had engaged him. By the way, the Historians place this Prince's deliverance on the 18th of March, and yet these Bonds are dated at Bayonne the 17th of the same month. When he came to Bayonne, Lang, who accompanied him as Ambassador, prayed him to ratify the Treaty of Madrid. But the King told him, that having exceeded in the Treaty, the power of a King of France, in granting the Duchy of Burgundy to the Emperor, he must proceed to the performance by fair means, and endeavour to obtain the consent of the Burgundians, and the approbation of the rest of his Subjects: That however, he designed to execute the Treaty, but wanted a little time to prepare for it. This answer might have sufficiently shewn the Ambassador, what the King intended. He followed him however to Bourdeaux, where the King's first care was to ratify the Treaty concluded at Moore with the King of England (3). From Bourdeaux he came to Cognac, where he made some stay, with the Viceroy of Naples still in his Train, who pressed him from time to time to ratify and execute the Treaty of Madrid, or return to Spain, according to his Oath. To this the King, to be excused, alleged, three reasons, which were far from being satisfactory to the Ambassador. The first was, that it was not in his power to resign Burgundy, because the Kings of France not being Proprietors of their Dominions, it was not lawful for them to alienate any part (4). The second, that he was compelled to sign the Treaty of Madrid. The third, that by his Coronation Oath, he had sworn not to alienate any part of his Kingdom, and this Oath annulled that which he had taken at Madrid. The Ambassador replied to the first, That though he could not alienate any of his Provinces, that was not to be understood of Dominions unjustly acquired by the Crown of France, as was the Duchy of Burgundy. To the second he answered, That it was left to his choice either to remain in the State, the chance of War, and the Will of God had thrown him into, or to be freed by a Treaty: That he had even solicited it, and it was difficult to conceive, wherein the Force he com-

1526. plained of confisted. To the third he said, That when the King swore to the Treaty of Madrid, he was not ignorant of his Coronation Oath, and probably, did not believe the second contrary to the first; that if it was otherwise, there would be reason to think, he had intended to impose upon the Emperor's easiness. Without examining here either the King's reasons, or the Ambassador's answers, it suffices to say in a word, the King was already relieved.

The Pope, the Venetians and the Duke of Milan, plainly foreseeing, Francis would scruple to execute the Treaty of Madrid, had sent Ambassadors to him, who found him at Cognac. They were received with great civilities, and the King immediately entered into Treaty with them concerning a League against the Emperor. The League was concluded indeed at Cognac, the 17th of May, between the Pope, the King of France, the Duke of Milan, and the Venetians (1); but it was not published till till he had seen the ratifications of the other Allies. The Viceroy of Naples, having some notice of it, summoned the King, for the last time, to execute the Treaty of Madrid. Whereupon Francis told him plainly, it was not in his power to resign Burgundy, though he had promised it. But to show him, he desired to live in Friendship with the Emperor his master, he offered to give him two millions of crowns of Gold, as an equivalent for Burgundy, and punctually to perform the rest of the Treaty.

Thus the Emperor's measures were entirely broken. He had the King of France no longer in his power, and yet, was not left obliged to sustain the efforts of the League newly concluded against him; not to mention the King of England, who probably would one time or other act offensively. His whole refuge consisted in having the King of France's two Sons in Hostage. But his embarrassment was not capable of making him yield on this occasion. He chose to run all hazards rather than consent to the least alteration of the Treaty of Madrid. His resolution being notified to Francis, the League was published at Cognac the 11th of June. Two things happened the conclusion of this League. The first, that the Castle of Milan, besieged by the Imperialists, being hard pressed, wanted a speedy relief, and the Pope and Venetians durst not send their Troops into the Field, before they were assured of the League with France. The second, that the King of France designing to offer the Emperor two millions of Crowns in lieu of Burgundy, he believed this offer would meet with a readier acceptance after the conclusion of the League. It is certain, this was his sole aim; and, if his offer had been accepted, he would never have ratified the League of Cognac. Nay, after the League was published, neither himself nor the King of England, ever made any considerable effort against the Emperor, their intent being only to frighten him, and obtain the restitution of the two Hostages upon reasonable Terms.

Thus, for once the Italians were the dupes of the French and the English, which deserves notice, as a thing very uncommon. Mean while Francis and Henry, to continue their Game, made a new Treaty, promising never to make Peace with the Emperor, unless he would restore the Hostages and pay Henry what he owed him. But this Treaty obliged them not to take arms to procure each other the satisfaction they demanded.

The Pope and the Venetians relying on the assistance of France and England, sent their Troops into the Field under the command of the Duke of Urbino, who suffered the Castle of Milan to be taken, and caused an attempt upon Genoa to miscarry, for want of sending the Allies a supply of fifteen hundred Men. Guicciardini insinuates, in several places, that the Duke acted but faintly against the Emperor, who was very weak in Italy, and that the Duke of Bourbon, who was returned to Milan, would if the least pressed, have been infallibly constrained to abandon the City.

Whilst the Duke of Urbino indirectly favored the Emperor, the Duke of Sessa the Spanish Ambassador at Rome, and Hugo de Moncada, who commanded at Naples in the Viceroy's absence, supplied other ways the weakness of the Imperialists, by exciting the Colonna's to make War upon the Pope, whilst his Troops were in the Duchy of Milan. This unexpected Invasion, which the Pope could ascribe only to the solicitations of the Emperor or his Ministers, caused him to resolve to send into the Kingdom of Naples the Army commanded by the Duke of Urbino in the Milanese, and to that end he obtained the consent of the Venetians. But the Duke of Sessa, to avoid the Invasion, the Kingdom of Naples was threatened with, so ordered it, that the Colonna's gave the Pope all the satisfaction he desired. The agreement was made at 1526. Rome the 22d of August, and the Duke of Urbino was countermanded.

But about a month after, when the Pope had expected it, the Colonna's with five or six thousand Men entered Rome in the night between the 19th and 20th of September, and so alarmed the Pope that he retired in a flight to the Castle of St. Angelo. As he was not very idle in that Castle, where he had nothing to maintain a Siege, Moncada went to him, and representing the danger he was in, and that besides Rome was going to be plundered, he persuaded him to make a separate Truce with the Emperor for four months. This was more than the Emperor wanted, who had now ordered Levas to be made in Germany, and was about to send back Louis to Naples with a good Body of Spanish Troops. When the Truce was signed, the Pope's Forces which served under the Duke of Urbino were recalled to Rome.

Mean while, the Pope was extremely surprised at Francis's slowness, who, though principal author of the League, made yet no effort to oblige the Emperor to restore his Sons. The King of England's indolence astonished him no less, because not knowing that the League concluded at Mare was only defensive, he had imagined the two Kings were to attack the Emperor with all their Forces. So, to excite them by raising their jealousy, he declared he intended to go into Spain and concert means with the Emperor to procure the Peace of Europe. This declaration very much confounded the French and Venetian Ambassadors. They were afraid there was some hidden Mystery in so extraordinary a Journey, and therefore used their best endeavor to dissuade the Pope from it. But Henry used a more effectual means, namely, a present of thirty thousand Ducats, which entirely diverted the pretended design of this Journey.

Shortly after, Clément VII broke his agreement with the Colonna's, and ordered the Troops, he had sent to Rome, to march into their Territories, having communicated them and deprived Pierpaolo Colonna of the Cardinalate. He affirmed that his Treaty with them was void, because he was forced to it. He thereby justified, in some measure, Francis's proceedings, whom, on the same pretence he had absolved from his Oath at Madrid.

Whilst these things passed at Rome, the Baron de Frondberg was marching from Germany towards Italy with an Army of thirteen or fourteen thousand Men, raised for the Emperor's service. Whereupon, the Duke of Urbino, who kept the Duke of Bourbon as it were besieged in Milan, quitted the Neighbourhood of that City, under colour of opposing the passage of the German's. Mean while, the Pope was not a little embarrassed. The Truce was soon to expire. Frondberg was marching to Italy, and the Viceroy of Naples was now in the Island of Corfica, leading to Naples a strong reinforcement of Spaniards. Mean time, the King of France was making no preparations to support his Allies, and the King of England showed the same remissness. Mean while, Frondberg, still continuing his march, arrived in the Marches, where the Prince of Orange came to join and serve under him as a Volunteer. Afterwards, about the middle of December, he repaired to the borders of the Marches, the Duke of Urbino not being able or willing to oppose his march. Here he expected the Duke of Bourbon who was to come and join him; but was not yet in condition to execute that design. The difficulty sprung from his having no Money to pay his Troops, who positively refused to go out of the City before they had received their Arrears, and even threatened to sack the Town. There was no other way to hinder them from executing their Threats, than to take the Plate belonging to the Churches. This served to pay part of what was due to the Troops, who had scarce received any thing since the Battle of Pavia, so destitute of Money was the Emperor. The Duke of Bourbon made use of another expedient to increase his Treasure: And that was to cause the Chancellor Moranz to be condemned to die, who to redeem his Life gave him twenty thousand Ducats. He afterwards became one of his chief Counsellors.

Whilst the Duke of Bourbon was employed in raising Money, Lansy, who was come to Naples with a Body of Spanish Troops, amused the Pope with Negotiations, pretending only to hinder him from taking any measures, by putting him in hopes of a speedy agreement with the Emperor. These hopes however became more and more remote after Frondberg's arrival. Whilst Milan was in danger, the Emperor had intimated to the Pope, that if he desired Francesco Sforza to be brought to his Trial, it was only to save the honor of the Empire, and he would give the Judges private Orders to declare him innocent. But after the arrival of the Germans, he demanded such a pecuniary reparation, that Sforza was by no means able to raise the Sum required. Wherefore the Emperor pretended that the Pope, the Venetians, and the Florentines should be his Securities.

The Pope and the Venetians had expected that immediately after the conclusion of the League of Cognac, Francis would send a strong Army into Italy, and with the King of England, make a powerful diversion upon the borders of Spain and Flanders. But, as we have seen, they were very much mistaken. Francis had concluded the League only to frighten his Enemy, and in hopes it would cause him to accept of the offered equivalent. He was desirous to avoid a War, and even thought himself so sure of succeeding by that means, that he had made with the King of England no Treaty to oblige them to take Arms unless they were attacked. Thus Henry knowing the King of France's disposition, took care to go no farther than he. Expresses and Envoys from the Pope and the Venetians frequently came to the two Courts to solicit them to War, but it was to no purpose. On the contrary, even after the Pope and the Venetians had solemnly declared War against the Emperor, Francis sent the Archbishop of Bourdeaux to make him again the same offer of two millions of Crowns in lieu of the Duchy of Burgundy. But the Emperor rejected it with disdain, and charged the Ambassador to tell his Master, he had acted like a Knaves and a Villain, and ought not to have forgot their last conversation (1). Probably, the Ambassador thought not proper to discharge his ungrateful a Commission. This afterwards occasioned a mistake which was not favorable to the King of France.

While Italy, France and Spain were in agitation, Henry lived peaceably in his Kingdom, and the Cardinal his Favorite was wholly employed about his College at Oxford, for which he incessantly obtained fresh Grants from the Pope and the King. The Pope durst not refuse him any thing at a time when he thought he wanted his credit, to incline the King his Master to War; and Henry was always ready to give him marks of his affection, by confirming whatever was granted by the Pope. This condescension of the Pope and the King proved fatal to several little Monasteries (2), which were suppressed by the Cardinal, and the Revenues applied to his College.

Ever since the publishing of the League of Cognac, the Pope and Venetians had used their constant endeavours, to persuade Henry not only to come into it, but declare himself Protector. It is easy to guess with what view they paid him this deference. They hoped to find him the same as formerly, ever ready to be inflamed, and to lavish away his Money for the affairs of others. There are, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, several Credentials of the Venetian Ambassadors addressed to the King, the Queen, and the Cardinal, probably, to press the King to come into this League. There is likewise Clement VII's Commiſſion to Hubert Gambara and Giovanni Baptista Sanga to treat with Henry. In this Commiſſion the Pope said, that the circumstances of the times forcing the Allies to conclude a League without the King of England's participation, they had however agreed, to declare him Protector. Wherefore he empowered his two Envoys to treat with that Monarch upon his entering into the League, and to change or alter the Articles, as should be agreed with him, nay, to annul it entirely, if it was thought necessary, and conclude another. Moreover, he gave them Powers to settle with him the Pension which was to be adjudged to him as Protector of the League, if he would please to accept of the Title. But this Pension, as appears elsewhere, was to be raised upon the Duchy of Milno and the Kingdom of Naples, after they were conquered. Thus, upon the hopes of an imaginary Pension, the Pope meant to persuade Henry to declare War with the Emperor, and consequently to draw him into very great and real Expences. But for once, Henry would not be his dupe. He knew by experience what it was to join with the Popes for the Italian affairs.

This year was fought the famous Battle of Mohatz in Hungary between Lewis II King of that Country, and Soliman Emperor of the Turks. Lewis lost the day, and was drowned in a Morass (3). The death of this Prince was a fresh source of calamities for Hungary. Ferdinand of Austria the Emperor's Brother, who had married Lewi's Sifter Ann, pretended to the Crown of that Kingdom, and had for Competitor John de Zapel, Vayvode of Transylvania. They were both elected by two different Parties. But John put himself under the protection of Seliman, who caused him to be crowned at Buda, whilst Ferdinand was taking measures to prosecute his right.

The affairs of Scotland still remained in the same situation, except that in the course of this year, the Queen, and Earl of Arran's or Huntly's Faction attempted to take away the King's Perion from the Earl of Angus. But the attempt miscarrying, the Earl was severely revenged of the Perions concerned.

Wars, caused his Money to be relied on as a fate ad, though when a Peace or Truce was made his interests were not thought of. But the scene was changed.
Henry, grown more wise by experience, was no longer willing to find Money for the affairs of others. Besides, the Treasure left him by the King his Father being long since exhausted, he could raise Money only by means of the Parliament, who always framed the laws, or made him purchase their Subsidies with some extraordinary favors. So Francis not finding in him the same dispositions as formerly, feared to engage too far, before he was secure of his assistance (4). He perceived, he was no longer inclined to favor the Emperor as before. But that did not suffice. It was also necessary to persuade him to join in the League of Italy, otherwise the whole charge of the War must have fallen upon France, which was however drained of Men, Money and Generals. For this reason, his aim was to induce the Emperor, through first of the League, to accept the equivalent offered him for England, and to continue the War in Italy, only till that France was relieved, or the King of England entirely engaged.
To that end, he made the Pope and ambassadors make promises, to hinder them from being impatient, but permitted them very ill. A small Body of Princes led in Italy, under the command of the Marquis of Saluzzo, was hitherto all that he contributed for the League whereto he was himself the author and head. Mean while, the Pope was extremely uneasy at seeing the slowness or rather coldness of the two Monarchs, on whom he relied. Indeed he had no cause to complain of Henry, who had made him no promise, and yet he ceased not earnestly to press him to undertake the defence of the Church, as if the Church could not have subsisted if the Emperor remained master of Milan. But he received only general Answers, Henry being unwilling to engage in the affairs of Italy, where he could reap no advantage. In the mean time, the Pope was at an expence when thiev him

Orange, and the chief Officers of the Army, the following Capitulation:

That the Pope should pay the Army four hundred thousand Ducats, namely, one hundred thousand down, fifty thousand in twenty days, and two hundred and fifty thousand within two months, assigning for that purpose a Tax upon the whole Ecclesiastical State.

That he should deliver into the Emperor's hands the Castles of St. Angelo, Civita Vecchia, Ostia, Città Castellana, Parma, Placentia, and Modena.

That the Pope, with the thirteen Cardinals, should remain prisoners in the Castle of St. Angelo, till a hundred and fifty thousand Crowns were paid, and then should be conducted to Naples or Gaeta, there to wait the Emperor's pleasure.

That the Chevalier Gregorio Casali the English Ambassador, Rizzo de Cori, and all the rest that were retired to the Castle, except the Pope and the thirteen Cardinals, should be at Liberty to go where they pleased.

That the Colonna's should be absolved from all Censures.

That when the Pope should go from Rome, he should leave a Legate, and the Court of the Rota (1).

The Capitulation being signed, Captain Alarcon, the same that had the Custody of Francis I, when a prisoner, entered the Castle of St. Angelo with three Companies of Spaniards, and as many of Germans, and strictly guarded the Pope and Cardinals. During the confusion caused by the Pope's Imprisonment, the Duke of Ferrara became master of Modena, the Venetians took Ravenna and Cervia, Sigismund Malatesta seized Rimini, and the Florentines expelling the Pope's Legate, recovered their Liberty.

Some time after, all the Troops which were in the Kingdom of Naples repaired to Rome to share in the Booty, and glean what the avarice of the Spaniards and Germans had left. The Imperial Army then at Rome consisted of twelve thousand Germans, eight thousand Spaniards, and four thousand Italians. But the Plague which presently after raged among the Troops, so diminished them, that 'tis said, when they came to go upon action, there was not ten thousand Men able to bear Arms. Mean while, the eager desire of Plunder, caused the Emperor's affairs to be so neglected, that the army remained unserviceable till the end of the year; whereas Bologna and the Towns of the Romagna might have been taken, which would have rendered the Emperor invincible in Italy. Besides, this negligence gave Francis time to send Troops into those parts, of which he would never have thought, if the Emperor's Generals had reaped from the taking of Rome, and the Pope's Captivity, the advantages they might have naturally expected, for the Service of their master. It is time now to speak of the affairs of England, the recital whereof has been interrupted by the relation of this year's events in Italy, because it was absolutely necessary for the understanding of the Sequel.

Since Francis had refused to execute the Treaty of Madrid, he had never ceased to press Henry to come into the League of Cognac. But whether Henry perceived that Prince's Views, or hoped, by managing the Emperor, to make himself Umpire of the Peace, he had kept within the Bounds of the defensive League concluded at Moore. At length, finding that probably, the Pope and Venetians could not long maintain the War, he was afraid, the Emperor would become master of all Italy, and with that increase of Power, grow too formidable to Europe. Indeed, it was easy to see, that to divest him of the Superiority he was going to acquire upon France, England would one day be forced to make greater efforts than were necessary to hinder his attaining it. These Considerations were further corroborated by the Instances of Cardinal Wolsey, whom Francis had taken care to gain to his Interest, otherwise all these reasons, probably, would have been ineffectual. So about the end of the last year, Henry had sent to Paris Sir William Fitz-Williams, to acquaint the King of France, that he was ready to join in an offensive League with him, and give him the Princess Mary his Daughter in Marriage. Francis gladly embracing the proposal, the Treaty was begun at Paris by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, the English Ambassador in ordinary, and Fitz-Williams. But as several difficulties occurred, which depended upon the King of England's determination, Francis thought it more proper to send Ambassadors to London, and conclude it there. He made choice for that purpose of Gabriel d'Aigremont, or de Gramont Bishop of Tarbes, and the Viscount of Turenne, with whom were joined the first President of Roan, and the Lord de Vaux, who were already in England. These Ambassadors (2) concluded with Cardinal Wolsey, appointed Commissioner to negotiate with them, three Treaties, which were signed the 30th of April 1527, when the Duke of Bourbon was marching to Rome.

The first Treaty ran:

That the two Kings should jointly send Ambassadors to the Emperor, with offers concerning the ransom of the two Hostages, and to demand the payment of what was due to the King of England.

That if he rejected the offers, or gave no answer within twenty days, the two Kings should proclaim War against him.

Another Article of this Treaty contained a mutual engagement for the Marriage of Francis, or his Son the Duke of Orleans with the Princess Mary, at the King of France's choice, and upon such Terms as should be agreed on when the time came (3). Probably, this Treaty was to be made publick, in order to induce the Emperor to desist from his claim to Burgundy, and be satisfied with the offered equivalent.

By the second Treaty it was agreed:

That in case the Emperor rejected their proposals, or deferred his answer, all Commerce should be forbidden with his Subjects, by the two Kings, allowing them however forty days to withdraw their Effects.

That the two Kings should make War upon the Emperor in the Low-Countries, with an Army of thirty thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Men at Arms, and that two thirds of the Foot, and all the Horse (4) should be furnished by the King of France.

That they should equip a Fleet with fifteen thousand Men, whereof the King of France should find ten thousand.

That if the King of Portugal, or any other Prince or State, should join with the Emperor, they should be declared Enemies to both the Kings.

That the Pope and Venetians should be deemed included in the League, provided they continued the War in Italy.

That the King of France should endeavour to persuade the King of Navarre, the Duke of Gueldres, [and Robert de la Mark] to make War upon the Emperor.

That the two Kings should use their joint endeavours to encourage John de Zepel to prosecute his right to the Crown of Hungary, in case he had not already made an Alliance with the Turk, in order to keep the Emperor's Brother Ferdinand employed in those parts.

That the League should be notified to the Princes of Germany, and the two Kings endeavour to prevent their assisting the Emperor.

The Substance of the third Treaty was:

1. That this Treaty should not derogate from that of Moore, which remained in force.

2. That there should be perpetual Peace between Francis and Henry, and their respective Subjects.

3. That neither of them should give aid or advice to any person whatever, that should attack the Dominions of the other.

4. Henry renounced for himself and Successors, all Right and Title to the Kingdom of France (5), and in general, whatever Francis now possessed.

5. In consideration whereof, Francis bound himself and Successors, to pay to Henry's Successors an annual pension for ever, of fifty thousand Crowns, at two payments; namely, on the 1st of May, and the 1st of November, and that the payment of the pension should commence, on the first of those two days which should happen after Henry's death, without deduction of what should remain to be paid after Henry's decease, of the two millions stipulated by the Treaty of Moore.

6. Moreover Francis bound himself to give yearly to Henry, fifteen thousand Crowns worth of Salt of Bruage (6), besides the fore-mentioned fifty thousand Crowns.

7. That, to prevent the objection which might hereafter be made, That a King can't bind his Successors, the two Kings should cause the Treaty to be confirmed by the States of their Realms, and held as a perpetual and inviolable Law.

The news of the facking of Rome and the Pope's Captivity arriving shortly after the conclusion of these Treaties, the two Kings thought fit to alter the Article of the second, concerning their carrying War into the Low-Countries, and to agree to act only in Italy. But as the English Troop could not be transported into Italy, without great difficulties and loss of time, they agreed, that the King of France should undertake the War alone, for a certain Sum (1), which Henry was to pay him monthly, till the end of October. This last Treaty was signed the 29th of May, about three weeks after the taking of Rome.

In consequence of the first of the three Treaties of April the 30th, Henry sent Sir Francis Pointz into Spain, to demand of the Emperor, that as, by their former Treaties, the War with France was carried on at a common charge, he would give him half the Booty taken at Pavia, and one of the two Hostages received from the French King. Pointz was accompanied with Clarencous King at Arms, but incognito, that he might be ready to do his Office, when there should be occasion. The Emperor easily perceived, the King of England fought only a pretence of quarrel. But as it was his Interest to prolong the time, he told the Ambassador he would send his answer to the King his master by an Express.

While the Ambassador was on his way to Spain, Francis and Henry hearing what had passed in Italy, thought proper that Cardinal Wolsey should go and confer with Francis at Amiens, in order to concert measures agreeable to the situation of affairs. Shortly after, Francis sent Laurac with the Forces designed for Italy (2).

Cardinal Wolsey departing from Court the third of July, arrived at Calais the 11th (3), from whence he went to Abbeville, and stayed till Francis came to Amiens. He was received at his entrance into the French Territories, with the same respect as would have been paid to the King of England. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, Francis's Letters Patents empowering the Cardinal, his dearest and great Friend, to release the prisoners, where-ever he came, what Crimes soever they were guilty of, except High-Treason, Rapes, [Coining, Sacrileges,] and the like, and to grant them a Pardon by his Letters Patents.

Whilst the Cardinal was at Abbeville, he received a Memorial from the Emperor, containing his answer to the King of France's offers to the Viceroy of Naples. He had, as was observed, rejected these offers at first with disdain, and refused to hear them mentioned. But the situation of his affairs being altered by the League between France and England, he believed it would be better to end all differences by a Peace, than run the hazard of maintaining the War alone against so many powerful Enemies. It was therefore in order to procure a Peace, that he sent this answer to the Cardinal, wherewith he imagined to have reason to hope, the King of France and Henry would be satisfied.

As this Memorial is very proper to illustrate the History of those times, it will not doubtless be unacceptable to insert the Substance thereof.

"The Emperor began with protesting, that by what he offered in this Memorial, he meant not to derogate from the Treaty of Madrid, but in the points only which were contrary to it. He added, that as to the Hostages, the King of France was not ignorant of the reason of their being in Spain, and had it in his power to recover them. Then he set forth the offers made by Francis to the Viceroy of Naples, containing the four following Articles:

1. Thirty thousand Ducats, or, thirty two thousand, two hundred and twenty two Crowns of gold, to be deducted out of what Francis owed him.

2. He left Paris, June 30, with eight hundred Lances. Galeard d. l. 18.

3. He was met at Badajoz by Montfaucon de Bayre with a thousand Horse, and after by John, Cardinal of Lorraine, and the Chancellor of Alemaigne. He was accompanied him first to Montfaucon, and then to Abbeville. He was attended by Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of London, the Lord Sandwich the King's Chamberlain, Edward Stanley Earl of Derby, Sir Henry Gaultred, Sir John was followed with many Knights and others, to the number of twelve hundred Horse. He, fol. 160. Nova, p. 531. Hobart, p. 53. He brought with him thirty thousand Crowns. Galeard d. l. 18. Hall says it was two hundred and forty thousand Pounds: fol. 161. Hillings, p. 297.

The King of FRANCE's Offer to the Emperor.

"I. That he would execute the Treaty of Madrid, provided Francesco Sforza was restored to the Duchy of Milan.

"II. That he would give the Emperor in lieu of Burgundy, two millions of Gold payable, namely, a good Sum in hand, when Queen Leonora should be delivered to him, and the rest at a day to be appointed, and then his Sons should be restored; unless the Emperor had rather have the whole Sum at once, and deliver at the same time the Queen and the two Hostages.

"III. That he would pay the King of England what was due from the Emperor.

"IV. He demanded that the Emperor should increase Queen Leonora's Dowry in proportion to the Sum he was to receive, since he could do it without any charge to himself.

The EMPEROR's Answer.

"The Emperor replied to these four Articles, by the eight following Declarations:

"I. That what should be agreed upon, should not be prejudicial to the Treaty of Madrid, except in such things as should be altered by mutual consent.

"II. That the Emperor's right to Burgundy should remain entire, as before the Treaty of Madrid.

"III. That all the Articles of the Treaty of Madrid, except such as were mentioned in these offers, should remain entire.

"IV. The Emperor in his fourth Declaration said, that he hoped the King of England, and the Lord Cardinal would cause the Sum of two millions of Gold, offered by the King of France, to be augmented. However, if that could not be, it should be understood, that this Sum was over and above what the Emperor owed the King of England, as well for Money lent, as for the Indemnity he had undertaken to discharge, which Sums the King of France had taken upon himself in the Treaty of Madrid. Besides likewise the restitution of the late Mr. de Bourbon's Estate, it being reasonable that his Heirs should partake of the benefit of the Treaty. Item, That the King of France should punctually perform all the rest of the Articles concluded on his part, in the Treaty of Madrid, before his Sons left Spain; the Emperor not being able, after what had passed, to take any Security, if the Hostages remained not in his power till the Treaty was fully executed.

"V. That pursuant to the Treaty of Madrid, what should be agreed upon, should be ratified by the States General of France, and approved by the Parliaments. Or if that could not be done by the States General, it should at least be ratified by the States of each Province.

"VI. The Emperor, declared, That he could not send the Queen his Sister to France till every thing was accomplished, and then the Queen and the Hostages should be sent together.

"VII. That as for Duke Sforza, the Emperor would appoint impartial Judges to decide his affair, and if he was found guilty of no crime for which he deserved to be deprived of his Duchy, he should be restored. But if he was condemned, the State of Milan should remain in the Emperor's disposal, according to Justice and Equity.

"VIII. That the King of England should be Guarantee of the future Treaty, and by his Letters-Patents engage to assist, at his own charge, with a certain number of Troops, him of the two Parties that should keep the Treaty, against him that should not observe it.

"Besides these eight Conditions, which the Emperor called Declarations, he demanded moreover in his memorial, that the King of France should satisfy him for 1527. " the expences of the Leagues he had made with him, and

 " of which he was the sole Author, empowering the King
 " of England to settle the Sum.

“ Finally, he said, That he did not question, the King of England, who perfectly knew what had passed between the two Parties, would not cause the King of France's offers to be increased, and that the Lord Legate, whom the Emperor always looked upon as his good Friend, would also endeavour the fame to the utmost of his power: That however, he was so inclined to Peace, that if the King of England desired, he should make any farther concessions than what were contained in the eight foregoing Declarations, he would do more for his sake than for any Prince's in the World. That he should be very glad, all the Potentates of Europe knew how much he valued his Friendship, and ascribed to him the whole Glory of procuring a Peace. This Memorial was dated at Valadolid the — of July 1527.

rial.*

If this answer of the Emperor be closely examined, it will be manifest, that he firmly and absolutely accepted of the French King's offers, under Terms denoting, it was he that gave, rather than received Law, and by his Declarations only obviated all possible Cavils. As to what he farther demanded, it was under such restrictions, that he seemed willing to stand to the King of England's determination, which at such a juncture was the same thing as to depart from his demands. There was but one single point concerning which he could not resolve to submit, namely, the Duke of Milan's affair. But this was a point newly propounded by the King of France, and which had no relation to the Treaty of Madrid, where nothing like it was to be found. However, it is plain if that had been the only obstacle to a Peace, he would also have granted it, since he referred a way to come off with honour; namely, by causing Sforza to be declared innocent, in the manner he had himself proposed to the Pope. Perhaps Francis would have accepted the Peace, on the Terms offered in the Memorial, if the Emperor had come to that resolution at first. But since he had made these offers to the Viceroys of Naples, the face of affairs was very much altered, as he had entirely gained Henry to his interest, and as, after the taking of Rome, it was to be feared the Emperor would become master of all Italy. Mean while, the Emperor's offers, which were in effect the same Francis had made to the Viceroys of Naples, were either to be accepted or rejected. But as it was not Henry's business to return an answer, since the affair did not directly concern him, he only sent the Memorial to the King of France, who no longer desiring to make Peace, disengaged himself in this manner. He demanded in the first place, that Sforza should be restored without condition. Secondly, that his Sons should be delivered before he recalled his Forces from Italy, where Laurens was now arrived, offering to deposit three hundred thousand Ducats in the hands of the King of England, for security of his word. There could not be a plainer evidence of his little desire to execute the Treaty of Madrid, though the same Terms only were demanded, as were offered by himself previously after his deliverance. He meant, after having withdrawn his Hostages, to have the execution of the Treaty in his own power, under colour of offering to deposit for security, three hundred thousand Ducats in the hands of a Prince devoted to him, and who, by a private Treaty, was engaged to make his Interest his own. The Emperor, unwilling to be thus injured, offered on his part to deposit the same Sum in the hands of the King of England, for pledge that the Hostages should be restored. But his offer being rejected, the affair stopped there, and War was only thought of. Mean while, the Emperor desiring to let all the World see, it was not his fault that a Peace was not concluded, gave the Ambassadors of England, of the Pope, and of the Venetians, the same answer he had sent to Cardinal Wolsey. They all seemed very well satisfied, and said their Masters would doubtless accept a Peace on their Terms, and send orders to conclude it. But they knew not that the Kings of France and England had altered their minds, and taken new resolutions.

Francis's Conference with Wolsey.

but rather to take measures, on supposition, that a War with the Emperor was infallible. Fraser being come to Abbeville the first of August, the Cardinal waited on him, and after conferring together, they concluded, on the eighteenth, three Treaties, which properly were only Supplements, Explanations, and Restrictions of the three foregoing ones.

By the first it was agreed :

I. That, as he had left it to the King of France's choice, to marry the Princess Mary, or leave her for the Duke of Orleans his second Son, the Duke should espouse the Princess when they should both be of Age. That then, and not before, should be settled the Marriage-Articles concerning the Dowry, the education of the Duke of Orleans in England, and the like. Moreover, that, whether the Marriage should be consummated, or the two Kings think fit to dispose of their Children otherwise, their Friendship should remain firm and inviolable, the Marriage being only to be considered as a Supplement to the Treaties of the thirtieth of April, and not as part of those Treaties.

II. That the Treaty concluded at Moore should remain in full force.

III. That the project of the Interview of the two Kings should be laid aside, on account of the season and circumstances of affairs.

IV. As by the Treaty of the twenty ninth of May, it was agreed, that the King of England should contribute a certain Sum for the War of Italy, it was concluded by this, that in case the Emperor accepted the offers the two Kings should make him by their Ambassadors, the said contribution should cease without any prejudice to the Treaty of Peace: But if he rejected them, the Treaty of League offensive and defensive should subsist, on condition that during this Campaign the King of England should be deemed to have discharged his part of the Treaty, by his Contribution for the War with Italy.

V. That the King of England should form no demands upon the King of France on pretence of his charges for the War of Italy.

VI. That to prevent all disputes, without examining the number of Troops which the King of France maintained in Italy, the King of England should pay for the month of June last twenty thousand Crowns, for the month of July last thirty thousand Crowns, and thirty two thousand two hundred and twenty two for each of the three following months. On condition however, that if in these three last months, the English Commissaries found in the Army of Italy, a less number of Troops than what the King of France was to maintain, the Contribution should be lessened in proportion. Moreover, if a Peace was made during these three last months, the Contribution should cease the day the Peace was concluded.

By the second Treaty, which concerned only Trade, p. 209, Francis promised to give the English Merchants such Privileges as should be agreed upon hereafter.

By a third Treaty the two Kings were bound :

First, Not to consent to the calling of a General Council during the Pope's Captivity.

Secondly, To receive no Bull, Brief or Mandate from the Pope (1) till he was released.

Thirdly, That till the Pope should resume the Government of the Church, whatever should be determined in England by the Cardinal Legate, assisted by the principal Members of the Clergy⁽²⁾, and in France by the Clergy of the Gallican Church, should be punctually executed.

These Treaties being concluded, Francis I ratified them and swore to the observance before he left Abbeville (3). Cardinal Wolsey did the same thing in his master's name, by virtue of his full Powers and Title of Vicar-General, which he had received on this occasion. After that, he returned into England, to give the King an account of the success of his Negotiation (4).

Henry being resolved to proclaim war against the Emperor, but willing to conceal the real motives, demanded of him, by his Ambassadors, four things, which he knew could not then be performed. The first was, That he

The second, that he should pay him the five hundred thousand Crowns to which he was obliged, in case he married not the Princess Mary, to whom he was affianced. The third, That according to the tenor of their Treaty, he should satisfy him for his Pension from the King of France, whereof there was now due four years and four months. The fourth, That he should release the Pope, and satisfy him for all the damages caused by his Troops. The Emperor answered the Ambassadors, first, That he had never denied his being debtor to the King of England; but was surprised he should at this juncture insist so much upon payment: That at least, when the money was required, the obligations should be offered to be refuted. Secondly, That he would write to the King their Master to acquaint him, why he did not think himself liable to the penalty of the five hundred thousand Crowns, for not consummating the Marriage. In the third place, That orders were sent into Italy to set the Pope free. He said nothing concerning making satisfaction for the Pension, because probably he considered it as included in the Article of the debts to which he owed himself bound, as indeed nothing was more reasonable.

A finely of the chief ideas of France. Mezzari.

The Emperor's Replies were not capable of satisfying Henry who only sought an occasion of quarrel. On the other hand, Francis having called together the chief Men, that is to say, properly, Persons devoted to him, declared to them all the steps he had made towards a Peace with the Emperor; and it may be easily guessed, he was not very careful to explain what the Emperor might allege against him. Having represented the matter as he pleased, he said, he was ready to return into captivity, if it was judged that he was obliged in Honour or Conscience. The Assembly unanimously replied, That his Person belonged to the Realm, and it was not in his power to dispose of it according to his pleasure: That moreover, he could not alienate the Provinces of the Crown, but if the Emperor would accept of a Ransom for the two Princes in hostage, they offered the King two millions of Gold to redeem them. A Man must have voluntarily shut his eyes, not to see what was the design of this Farce, entirely managed by the Court. Mean while, the King believing, after this decision, that he might, with a safe Conscience, go to war with the Emperor, thought only of means to recover his Sons by force of Arms. He still hoped however, the dread of a War would induce the Emperor to mitigate the Treaty of Madrid. This was not now with respect to Burgundy, since he could not be ignorant that the Emperor had accepted the offered Equivalent. But he was in hopes, by means of the War, to procure a new Treaty, which should annul that of Madrid. Thus many Princes play with their Words and Oaths, and seek to blind themselves, or at least, the publick, whilst none about them dare to tell them the Truth. The Emperor kept his word no better, with regard to the Duchy of Milan; and Henry VIII scrupled not to break his League with the Emperor, as he had before violated that with Francis. Princes never want excuses when they have a mind to break a Treaty. But the publick is not always imposed upon, though frequently they appear so to be. Probably, the Sovereigns themselves are not so blind, but they see the irregularity of their Conduct, though, countenanced by the dissimulation of the publick, they affect the great security. But the time comes at last, when Posterity, less prepossessed, does justice to all the World, and calls things by their proper names.

Francis, willing to preserve the Friendship newly contracted with Henry, sent him the Order of St. Michael (1) by Ann de Montmorency (2), one of the Knights. This Lord had power to dispense with Henry's Oath, in whole or in part, as the new Knight should think fit, or even to be contented with his bare word. Henry was pleased to swear to observe all the Statutes of the Order of St. Michael, which were not contrary to those of the Garter, or any other Order he had already received. Then he sent the Order of the Garter to Francis, by Arthur (Plantagenet) Viscount Lisle, natural Son of Edward IV (3), and Francis took the usual Oath of the Order, with the same restrictions. The French Ambassador, who arrived in England about the end of October, was received with such magnificence, that du Bellai, who accompanied him, assures us, he had never seen the like. The English Ambassador was received in the same manner in France, there having ever been between Francis and Henry an emulation, which frequently threw them into needless expences. But it was most inconvenient for Francis, by reason of his continual wars with the Emperor, wherein Henry was no farther engaged than he pleased: Nay, he paid the very contribution for the War of Italy, by way of deduction for the Sums owed him by Francis (4), as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Thus Francis was forced to disburse all the Money employed in that War, of which I must now relate the Sequel.

Clement VII was still confined in the Castle of St. Angelo, till he could pay the Sums exacted upon him. As he had but little Money, he could only pay part of what he had promised, and therefore his Captivity was longer than he expected at first: they in whose Custody he was, had not advice of the sacking of Rome, and the Pope's Imprisonment sooner than the beginning of June, and it was above a month before he came to any resolution. As he did not question this affair would make great noise in the World, he was willing to see, before he determined what to do, how the Kings of France and England would take it, in order to proceed accordingly. The 2d of Herbert August, he writ to Henry to excuse himself concerning the outrages committed by his Troops at Rome, and the violence exercised upon the Pope's Person, wherein he protested, he was not concerned. At the same time, he asked his advice about what was to be done on this occasion, as if he still deemed him his good Friend and Ally. But it was only to gain time, till he received Francis's answer to the Memorial sent to Cardinal Wolsey. On the other Letters to hand, the Pope, though narrowly watched, had found means to write to Henry (5), and cause the thirteen Cardinals, who were confined with him, to do the same, desiring his protection, and entreating him to use his best endeavours to free them from their unhappy condition. Henry, upon receipt of these Letters, sent orders to his Ambassadors in Spain, to demand of the Emperor the Pope's and Cardinals Liberty: To which the Emperor answered in general terms, that he would do what lay in his power for the King of England's satisfaction. Mean while, he was thinking of conveying the Pope into Spain, in expectation of making a better bargain with him than if he left him in Italy. Of this Cardinal Wolsey informed Henry by a Letter from Abbeville of the twenty ninth of July.

It is certain, Henry's Instances in the Pope's behalf greatly embarrassed the Emperor. He found that Francis and Henry would not fail to join their Councils and Forces against him, under colour of labouring for the Pope, and this union could not but break all his measures, with respect to his affairs in Italy. He believed therefore, that before all things he should try to divide them, by sowing jealousies and suspicions between them. One of his expedients to this end, was to propose to the Cardinal a marriage between the Duke of Richmond, natural Son of Henry, and Isabella Princess of Portugal, with whom he offered in Dower the Duchy of Milan. The Cardinal acquainted the King with it by a Letter of the 31st of July, telling him withal, that the offer was not much to be relied on, but however, it was proper to seem to listen to it, because it was necessary still to preserve some correspondence with the Emperor. This related without doubt to the affair of the Divorce, which I shall presently speak of. For, by a Letter of the first of August, the Cardinal informed the King it was reported in Spain, he intended to divorce the Queen; but that it was requisite to send orders to his Ambassadors at Madrid to stifle the rumour as much as possible. That to this end, they might say, it had no other foundation than the Bishop of Tarbes's scruples concerning the Princess Mary's Marriage with the Duke of Orleans, as if there was room to question the Princess's Legitimacy. The Emperor also used another way to divide Francis and Henry, by trying to gain Cardinal Wolsey by advantageous offers (6). But for once, he could 1527. not succeed; whether Wolsey was now too far engaged with Francis, or was bent to be revenged of the Emperor, who had twice deceived him, or whether the business of the Divorce was now resolved, in which case it was not possible for him to promise to espouse the Emperor's Interests.

When Francis heard of the sacking of Rome, he perceived it was time to lay aside artifice, and necessary to send a powerful aid into Italy, otherwise the Venetians would infallibly conclude a Peace with the Emperor. Indeed, it was not likely, they could or would bear alone the burden of the War. Wherefore his first care was to make a new Treaty with them (1), to bring each into the Field ten thousand Men, and levy ten thousand Switzers at a common charge. The Venetians desired nothing more than to be supported by France, because they justly dreaded, that the Army which had sacked Rome would be employed against them. Indeed, if the Duke of Bourbon had been alive, or the Viceroy of Naples able to influence the Army, the Venetians would undoubtedly have been attacked, being the only Enemies the Emperor had in Italy. But happily for them, the Imperial Troops being wholly intent upon the plunder of Rome, without thinking of any other undertaking, the Plague which broke out among them, swept away two thirds of the Soldiers. In short, the Distemper destroying them by heaps, they left Rome, and dispersed themselves in the neighbouring Country. After which, having sacked Terni and Narni, and extorted Money from Spoleto, the Germans parted from the Spaniards, and returned to Rome. Thus discord arising in the Army, which ill obeyed the Prince of Orange, though they had chosen him for General, they projected nothing to improve their Victory for the Emperor's advantage.

On the contrary, by their negligence, they gave Francis time to send Troops into Italy, under the Command of Lautrec, who was declared General of the League he had newly concluded with the Venetians. As for the Duke of Urbino, he continued in the Milanese with part of the Venetian Army.

Lautrec arrived in Piedmont in July, with part of the Army he was to command. The Marquis of Saluzzo was ordered to join him with his Italians, and the Switzers were to come presently after. Whilst he was employed in Conquests of little moment, waiting the junction of all his Forces, Andrea Dorio, who had quitted the Pope's Service, and commanded the French Gallies, to which he had joined eight others of his own, found means to reduce the City of Genua under Francis's Dominion.

This was a good opening of a Campaign, which seemed to promise an advantageous Success in the rest of the War, especially as Lautrec, after assembling his whole Army, consisting of twenty five thousand Men, became master of Vigevano, Alexandria, and Pavia. Sforza and the Venetians earnestly pressed him to besiege Milan; but he shewed them positive orders to march to Naples. The King of France took care not to employ his Army to conquer the Duchy of Milan, which by the Treaty of League was to be restored to Sforza, after which, the Venetians would give themselves but little trouble to accomplish his attempt upon Naples. Besides, he still hoped, that by confenting, the Emperor should keep Milan, he might recover his Sons, whereas in restoring Sforza he should deprive himself of that means. Lautrec therefore began his march to the Kingdom of Naples, but with such slowness and affected delays, that it was evident, he had private orders not to make too much haste. And indeed, it was at the time that Francis expected the Emperor's final answer to the offers made him by his and Henry's Ambassadors. Lautrec long halted at Parma and Placentia, which had opened their Gates to him. Mean while, the Duke of Ferrara joined with France, as well on account of Lautrec's march, who might have easily ravaged his Country, as of Francis's offer to give in marriage to his Son Hercules, Renée of France, second Daughter of Lewis XII. The Duke of Mantua presently after followed his example.

Mean while, the Emperor seeing the ill effects of the Pope's Captivity, had dispatched the General of the Order of St. Francis to the Viceroy of Naples, with orders to release the Pope. The General finding the Viceroy seized with a Distemper whereof he died in a few days, delivered the orders to Hugo de Moncada to be executed. The Emperor had given general Instructions, that the Pope should be bound to pay the Arrears due to the Army, and give Security, after having his liberty, to forsake the League. But as it was not easy for the Pope to find Pledges, or the Money necessary to pay the Army, the Negotiation was prolonged. Mean while, he continually solicited Lautrec by private Messengers to approach Rome in order to facilitate his deliverance. But Lautrec had positive orders which hindered him from making haste, and yet his march, though slow, was of good Service to the Pope. Moncada seeing the Kingdom of Naples was going to be invaded, and that it was not possible to lead thither the Imperial Army which was at Rome, without giving them Money, concluded at last (2) a Treaty with the Pope to this effect:

I. That the Pope should not oppose the Emperor in the affairs of Naples or Milan.

II. That he should grant the Emperor a Crusade in Spain, and a Tenth in the rest of his Dominions.

III. That the Emperor should keep Civita Vecchia, Ofina, Citta Castellana, and the Castle of Furl.

IV. That the Pope should pay down to the German Troops, sixty thousand Ducats, and thirty five thousand to the Spaniards.

V. That in a fortnight after, he should pay them another certain Sum, and within three months all the rest that was due to the Emperor, amounting to above three hundred and fifty thousand Ducats.

VI. That till the two first payments were made, the Pope should be conducted to some safe place out of Rome, and give Hostages.

The Treaty being signed, and the Cardinals of Cefis and Orsino delivered in Hostage, it was agreed, that on the 10th of December the Pope should be taken out of the Castle of St. Angelo, and conducted to a place appointed. But as he was afraid of a longer confinement, because he was unable to perform the Treaty, he escaped in disguise the night before, and shut himself up in Orvieto.

When Lautrec heard that the Pope was at Liberty, he returned to him the City of Parma, and marched to Bologna, where he stayed three weeks expecting fresh orders from the King. Some days after, he received a Letter from Clement VII. acknowledging himself indebted to him for his Liberty, intimating withal, that having been forced to grant the Imperialists whatever they required, he did not think himself obliged to perform his Engagements.

It was whilst the Pope was prisoner in the Castle of St. Angelo, that Henry's Divorce was set on foot; a momentous affair, if ever there was one, as well in it self, as on account of the Parties concerned, and chiefly for its effects. It was not yet thirty years since Lewis XII put away his Wife without any difficulty, or much noise in the world. Henry VIII had a mind to attempt the same thing, and though supported with much more plausible reasons, he met with insuperable obstacles, not to be surmounted without an extraordinary method, which gave occasion to the establishment of the Reformation in England. This effect distinguished Henry VIII's Divorce from so many others, which are but slightly mentioned by Historians. The writers upon this subject being either Catholics or Protestants, have considered it variously. The Catholics have drawn Arguments from thence against the Reformation in England, and represented Henry's Divorce, as the next and immediate cause of the change of Religion; whereas the Protestants affirm, it was only the occasion. Three English Authors especially have written the History of this Divorce, besides many others of the same Nation, or Foreigners who have spoke of it in their works. Sanders, or rather Sanders, Author of the Origin and Progress of the English Schism, makes it his business to defend Henry VIII., and shew that the Reformation in England, which he terms Schism, entirely sprung from Henry's passion for Ann Bullen. He fancied by that to give a mortal wound to the Reformation, and cause the world to think, that a Superstition raised on such a foundation, could not be the work of God. The Lord Herbert, in his History of Henry VIII., contents himself with a bare recital of the events of this Reign, whereof the Divorce is one of the principal, without many reasonings, leaving his Readers to make Inferences from the Facts he relates. Doctor Burnet intending to write the History of the Reformation of England, made it his chief aim, in speaking of Henry's Divorce, to shew, that though it occasioned the Reformation, it was only by accident. For this reason he has endeavoured to refute the palpable falsehoods asserted by Sanders in his History. He has succeeded so well, that no sincere Man can for the future acknowledge Sanders for a writer worthy of Credit.

The Sequel of my History obliges me to speak, in my turn, of this famous Divorce. I should be inclined to refer the Reader to the aforementioned excellent History of the Reformation of England, known to all the world, and to which it is difficult to make any additions, but it would not be reasonable to oblige the Readers to remember what they have read in that History, or to peruse 1527. it again. Wherefore I shall chuse, in pursuing the thread of my History, to relate this Event, which is as the Hinge whereon do turn numberless other things, which that illustrious Author had occasion only to mention, but which I must more fully explain, because our ends are different. His aim in speaking of Henry VIII's affairs with the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of France, was to illustrate the History of the Reformation, and mine is, not to meddle with the affairs of Religion any farther than they relate to the other events of this Reign.

Henry had been married eighteen years to Catherine of Aragon, and by her had three Children, whereof one was living, when he formed the design to put her away. He alleged, as the principal reason, his scruples for marrying his Brother's widow. But, as 'tis pretended, these scruples troubled him not till he was in love with Ann Bullen, one of the Queen's Maids of Honour, it is inferred, that his doubts concerning the validity of his Marriage, sprung from this new passion, and without that, would never have existed (1). Accordingly, some Labour to shew his Divorce had no other foundation than his love for that Lady. Others again endeavour to prove, that his love and his scruples were independent of each other. For my part, I should think it needless to accuse or justify Henry, with regard to the concerns of Religion, if there was not some necessity to illustrate this matter with respect to the History. By illustrating, I mean, shewing the impossibility of giving a certain Judgment about it. But before all things, it is necessary to describe the person, who, as it is pretended, was the prime Cause of the King's Divorce, and of all the Consequences thereof.

Ann Bullen (2) was of a good, though not a noble, Family. Sir Thomas Bullen her Father, married a Sister of the Duke of Norfolk (3), and by her had Ann, born according to Camden in 1507, about two years before Henry VIII's Accession to the Throne. Thomas Bullen her Father was twice Ambassador to France, first in 1515, and again in 1527. He was made Viscount Rochford in 1525, and afterwards Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond (4). Ann his Daughter, being but seven years old, was carried into France in 1514, when Mary the King's Sister went and consummated her Marriage at Amboise, with Lewis XII. That Queen being re-married shortly after to the Duke of Suffolk, and returning into England, Ann Bullen was left in France. It is pretended, she then entered into the Service of Francis I's Queen, though she was but eight years of age; but it is not said in what quality. It is certain, a Girl of her age was not capable of doing much Service. So, it may be presumed her Beauty, Gentleness, or the liveliness of her Wit, made Queen Claude desirous to keep her about her. Camden affirms, she retained her in her Service to the day of her death, which happened in July 1524, and says not that Ann ever took a Journey into England all that time. But Du Tillet, and Du Pleix, French Authors, pretend, she came over in 1522. The Lord Herbert says the same thing, but, without citing any particular Author, contents himself with saying, it appears in History. Camden affirms, Ann remained in France, not only till Queen Claude's death, but that, after she had lost her Mistress, she was taken into Service by the Duchess of Alençon, Francis's Sister. However, he does not say when she quitted it. Others affirm, Sir Thomas Bullen brought his Daughter to England when he returned from his Embassy. His Embassy of 1515, can't here be meant, since it is unanimously agreed, that Ann was in Queen Claude's Service after Queen Mary's departure, and continued several years in the Court of France. It must therefore be his Embassy of 1527. But 'tis likely, Bullen was not sent to France till September 1527, since his sole Commission was to see the Treaty of the 30th of April of the same year sworn to, which Francis had not ratified sooner than the 18th of August, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts (5). But as, before his departure, the affair of the Divorce was already commenced, it may be affirmed, the King's love for his Daughter was later than his resolution concerning the Divorce, if it be true that Ann returned to England with her Father, about the end of the year 1527. Indeed it may be objected, that two French Authors assert, that Ann went over to England in 1522, and that it was then the King fell in love with her. But it may be replied first, that it is very strange, these two Historians, who wrote long after the fact, should meet with Memoirs of the Journey of a Maid of Honour, and the more as they cite nothing to support their Testimony. Secondly, supposing it were so, they don't say Ann lived in England. Consequently they deny not Camden's Testimony, who affirms, Ann served Queen Claude till 1524, and afterwards the Duchess of Alençon. But if it be true, that Ann took a Journey into England in 1522, and the King then fell in love with her, it can't be supposed she returned to France, because the rupture between the two Crowns happening that year, it is not likely that in time of War, an English Woman should go and serve a Queen of France. Besides, if the King was then in love, would he have suffered Ann to depart the Kingdom? Consider therefore, or the two French Authors must have been mistaken. This is a difficulty not to be easily solved.

But there is a fact which pates for certain, namely, that Ann Bullen being twenty years old, was taken into Queen Catherine's Service as Maid of Honour. Now this must have been in 1527, since she was born in 1507. Accordingly, this is the time to which the beginning of the King's love may most properly be fixed. But still this is only a Conjecture, which, were it well grounded, would be a sufficient proof, that the King's Divorce was not an effect of his passion, since it was resolved before the end of the year 1526. My aim in this Inquiry is to shew, that the time of Ann Bullen's return into England is very uncertain, and the beginning of the King's affection no less so. How then can it be so boldly affirmed, as it is by some, that Love for Ann Bullen inspired the King with the thoughts of annulling his Marriage with Catherine? We must see now whether it be easier to discover the time when Henry resolved to sue for his Divorce.

When Henry VII concluded his Son's Marriage with Catherine Prince Arthur's Widow, Archbishop Warham told him plainly, it was contrary to the Law of God, which the Pope could not dispense with. The King, without doubt was touched with this Remonstrance. The very day the Prince his Son entered into his fourteenth year, he caused him to make against his Marriage, a feigned Protestation, though before trusty witnesses, declaring, he was constrained to give his consent. After that, the King on his death-bed strictly charged the Prince not to consummate his Marriage with Catherine. Notwithstanding all this, Henry VIII being come to the Crown, espoused the Princess contrary to Warham's opinion, to which he preferred the Bishop of Winchester's. He had by her three Children (6), two Sons and a Daughter, of whom the Sons died soon after their Birth. He afterwards affirmed, that he considered the untimely death of his two Sons, as God's curse on his Marriage, especially, when he saw the Queen had done breeding. It happened afterwards that Charles V, who was affianced to the Princess Mary, refused to marry her, upon the Council of Spain's questioning the Princess's Legitimacy. After that, when a Marriage was treating between Mary and King Francis, or the Duke of Orleans, the Bishop of Tarbe the French Ambassador, made the same objection, maintaining, that the Princess could not be deemed born in Wedlock, notwithstanding Julius II's Dispensation.

All these things were more than sufficient to raise scruples in the King's mind concerning his Marriage. But though in an Assembly of Lords which he afterwards called, to inform them of his reasons for a Divorce, he affirmed, the Bishop of Tarbe's objection inspired him with the first thoughts of inquiring into the matter, it appears however, that his scruples began sooner. For in a Letter (7) afterwards to Gryneus, he told him, he had abstained from the Queen ever since the year 1524.

But supposing it could be discovered at what time Henry began, either of himself, or by the Suggestion of others, to be troubled with these scruples, it would signify nothing with respect to his resolution concerning the Divorce, which in all appearance was taken much later. Polydore Virgil says, Longland Bishop of Lincoln, the King's Confessor, laboured to persuade him of the necessity of the Divorce by Cardinal Wolsey's order, but mentions not the time. All the Historians affirm, the King had recourse himself to Thomas Aquinas's works to clear his doubts, and caused the Bishops to be consulted upon that head. But none of them say at what time this was done. It is well known, Secretary Knight was dispatched to Rome about this affair in July 1527, but then the rumour of the King's meditating a Divorce had already reached the Court of Spain, as appears in the Cardinal's Letter to the King from Abbeville (1). It is also very probable, that before he engaged in this affair, Henry had considered of it some time before. It is scarce to be supposed a resolution of this nature can be taken lightly, or when taken, immediately executed, without thoroughly weighing the difficulties, or waiting a favorable juncture. Henry said himself that the Bishop of Tarbes bred the thought of annulling his Marriage. But if it be true, as some affirm, that the Bishop spoke only as directed by Cardinal Wolsey, it may be presumed, the project of the Divorce was formed some time before, and this Ambassador made to speak only to have an excuse to commence the affair. This is what seems to me extremely probable. Indeed it is not likely the Ambassador, after thus questioning Mary's Legitimacy, would have concluded the Marriage of the King his master, or of the Duke of Orleans, with that Princess, had he not acted in concert with the Court of England. These then are my thoughts, which I submit to the Reader's Judgment.

Conjecture
Subject.

Ever since Francis was freed from his Captivity, he had never ceased to press Henry to join with him in an offensive League against the Emperor. But Henry had constantly excused himself, without even suffering him to entertain the least hopes in that respect. However, Lord Herbert says, that about the end of the year 1526, Henry of his own accord sent an Ambassador to France to propose this League, so eagerly desired by Francis, and to offer him his Daughter Mary in Marriage. This proceeding gives occasion to believe, he had now resolved upon the Divorce, and foreseeing how much the Emperor would oppose it, intended so to embarrass him as to oblige him to court his Friendship. Upon this supposition it may naturally be conjectured, that he proposed the Marriage of his Daughter with the King of France, only to convince the Emperor, that he really designed to be strictly united with France. But at the same time it is very likely, he informed Francis of the obstacle which would occur in the execution of this pretended project, namely, the Divorce of the Princess's Mother, which he was meditating. This Conjecture is confirmed by the coldness wherewith these two Monarchs treated of the Marriage. In the first place, Henry left it to the King of France's choice, to have Mary himself, or to leave her to his second Son, as if this alternative were the same thing. In the next place, when Francis declared he would leave Mary to the Duke of Orleans, the treating more fully concerning the Marriage was deferred to another time. In the third place, in the Treaty Francis and the Cardinal concluded at Abbeville, they took care to insert this Clause: That though the Marriage should not be effected, the Treaty however should subsist. In fine, though Knight was now at Rome, or on his way thither, when the Treaty of Abbeville was concluded, it does not appear Francis ever complained to Henry, that he had offered him a Princess whom he was labouring to bastardize, in prosecuting his Divorce with the Queen her Mother. On the contrary, he assisted him to the utmost of his power to obtain his desires. But he must have looked upon the offer as an affront, had they not understood one another. If this Conjecture has any foundation, it may be inferred, that the resolution concerning the Divorce was taken at least about the end of the year 1526, though the execution was deferred till the middle of the next year. But in that case, it would therefore be true, that the King had resolved upon the Divorce before his passion for Ann Bullen, who, in all appearance, returned not into England sooner than October 1527.

From what has been said it may be gathered, that to affirm with any probability, that Henry's passion for Ann Bullen was the cause of his Divorce with Catherine, these queries must be decided in favour of that opinion. At what time did Ann Bullen return into England? When did the King's love for her first begin? When was it that he came to a resolution concerning his Divorce? But upon all these questions, conjectures only, as I have observed, can properly be formed. Thus much is certain, that between the resolution about the Divorce, and the beginning of the King's love, was no great distance of time. There we must stop. But it is going too far, to ground upon this nearness, as a certain fact, that Henry undertook the prosecution of his Divorce with Catherine, on purpose to marry Ann Bullen. I say, moreover, that though there was no difficulty about the times, and they exactly corresponded, yet as to what passed in the King's Breast, it would be only Conjecture.

I have enlarged a little on this point, because the illustrious Author of the History of the Reformation seems to leave it something in the dark. Besides, I thought it requisite to curb the over-confident, by informing the Readers of what is true, and what doubtful in the matter. We see it in many Histories, and hear it every day positively affirmed, as if there was no difficulty, that Henry's Love for Ann Bullen was the sole Cause of his Divorce with Catherine of Arragon, though, as I have shewn, it can only be said by conjecture, and the conjecture it self does not countenance that notion. Not that Henry VIII is to be considered as a Prince incapable of being misled by his Passion, even to the sacrificing Catherine of Arragon to Ann Bullen. Why should he have been more scrupulous with respect to Catherine, than he was with regard to Ann herself, whom he made no difficulty to sacrifice to a third Wife, as will hereafter be seen. He was a Prince of an impetuous Temper, who could bear no opposition to his Will. The Flatteries of his Subjects, and the extravagant Praises continually bestowed on him by the Sovereigns who stood in need of him, had possessed him with such a flood of his own Merit, that he imagined his Actions ought to have been the standard of good Sense, Reason, and Justice. When therefore it is said, his love for Ann Bullen caused him eagerly to push the affair of his Divorce, of which otherwise the difficulties would perhaps have discouraged him, nothing is affirmed repugnant to his Character. Only care must be taken, not to assert for an undoubted Truth, what is but a bare Conjecture.

However this be, without dwelling longer upon the King's secret motives, and endeavouring to discover his Thoughts, which lie hid from human eyes, let us content our selves with what he published himself. In the first place, he said, He was troubled in conscience for his Marriage with Catherine, and indeed he had but too much reason. The wonder is, that he had not these scruples more early. He had married his Brother's Widow, and found it forbidden by the Law of Moses. It is true, he had the Pope's dispensation. But he could not be ignorant that many learned Divines were of opinion, that the Pope could not dispense with the Laws of God.

This was sufficient to give him very just Scruples. As he laboured to inform himself about his doubts, he found in Thomas Aquinas what he had perhaps inattentively read many times: First, that the Levitical Laws are moral and eternal: Secondly, that the Pope cannot dispense with the Laws of God, because to dispense with a Law, one must be superior [or equal] to the Law-giver. This decision of a Divine, for whom he had a great esteem, confirming his scruples, he desired Archbishop Warham, who had formerly declared against the Marriage, to consult the Bishops of England upon this occasion. Some affirm, that Longland his Confessor cherished his doubts, by the private orders of Cardinal Wolsey, which is not improbable. The Queen was Aunt of the Emperor, with whom Wolsey had reason to be displeased. Besides, the Favorite loved not the Queen herself, because she could not help shewing how much she was offended, that a Bishop, a Cardinal, a Legate of the Holy See, should lead so scandalous a life. However this be, soon after the Archbishop presented to the King a writing, under the Hands and Seals of all the Bishops, wherein they condemned his Marriage as contrary to common decency, and the Law of God. Only Fisher Bishop of Rocheſter refusing to set his hand, it is said the Archbishop made another write his name unknown to him (2). But the Bishops were not the only Persons of this opinion. Since Luther's Works began to appear, many People in England were put out of their former high conceit of the Papal Power. As therefore the validity of the King's Marriage was wholly founded on Julius II's Dispensation, it was publicly disputed whether the Dispensation could authorize a Marriage so notoriously repugnant to the Law of God: Nay, many who were otherwise strongly attached to the Court of Rome, could not relish the Doctrine of the Pope's dispensing with the divine Laws. All these things conspired either to breed or confirm the King's scruples.

But it was not only scruples of Conscience that Henry alleged to justify his design. He pretended, that though he were regardless of his salvation, or able to overcome his scruples, the good of his People required the prevention of an inconvenience which was easily to be foreseen. He had but one Daughter, and very likely should have no more Children, if his Marriage were not annulled. If therefore, after his deſecate, the validity of his marriage with Catherine should come to be questioned, he foreſaw 1527. England would again be involved, on account of the Succession, in troubles from whence she was but just freed. Mary his Daughter, the King of Scotland his Nephew, the Queen Dowager of France, could equally pretend to the Crown, upon very plausible Reasons. Mary could allege the Pope's dispensation against such as should charge her with her being born of an unlawful Marriage.

Rejoins putting him to open of falsehoods. Burnet.

The King of Scotland, who was next Heir after her, could maintain, the Dispensation was not valid. The Queen Dowager the King's Sister could allege, that the first was Illegitimate, and the second, a Foreigner. These several Claims might easily kindle a civil war in England, where it was but too visible that each would find Adherents, not to mention the foreign succours they might be supported with. Henry therefore imagined there was but one way to prevent this danger, namely, by annulling his Marriage, and taking another Wife, by whom, with God's blessing, he might have Sons. He to whom the secrets of all hearts are open, can only know for certain, whether this Thought was inflamed into him by the danger he foresaw, by his aversion to the Queen, or by his Love for Ann Bullen. But however this may be, independently of the several motives ascribed to him, it is certain, there was great danger of the Kingdom's being one day exposed to a civil War, if the King remained till death in his present state, and he saw no other way to come out of it, than by annulling his Marriage. It is true, he foresaw great opposition from the Emperor the Queen's Nephew, who was then very powerful. But on the other hand, as that Monarch had himself shown on this occasion scruples, which hindered him from espousing Mary, Henry hoped, he would not obstinately maintain what he had himself questioned. Besides, the juncture seemed very favorable for his purpose. The Pope, who was Prisoner in the Castle of St. Angelo, seemed to have no other resource to be resorted to his former state, than the assistance of France and England, and Henry did not question that Francis, who stood in need of him, would promote his Proceedings to the utmost of his power. As to the rest, he never doubted the Pope's authority, reckoning that Clement VII could revoke a Dispensation granted by Julius II. Nay, Cardinal Wolsey warranted the success of the affair, whether he had already gained the Pope, or imagined, that Clement in his present circumstances could deny the King nothing. So, it was resolved the Suit should be moved in the Court of Rome, to cause the Marriage to be annulled.

Rejoins to be said before the Pope. Burnet.

Nullities in Julius's Bull.

The best reason that could be alleged, was, That Julius's dispensation was contrary to the divine Law, and that alone ought to have been sufficient. But it would have been imprudent to begin with disputing the Prerogative of the Roman Pontiffs, when a favour was to be asked of the Court of Rome. Recourse therefore was to be had to another expedient, which was to find Nullities in Julius's Bull, and show it was procured by false promises, and untrue suggestions, which rendered the Bull revocable, even according to the Rules of the Court of the Rota (1). And this was not very difficult. The Bull was grounded upon Henry's and Catherine's request, setting forth that their marriage was necessary to preserve Peace between England and Spain. And here were found two reasons for revoking the Bull. The first, that Henry being then but twelve years old, could not be deemed to have any political views, whence it was inferred, that the request was not his own. The second, that the suggestion was false, since as matters then stood between Spain and England, the Marriage was not at all necessary for the preservation of Peace between the two Crowns, and consequently Julius II had been surprized. Another Nullity was found, as the Bull having no other foundation than the maintenance of Peace and Union between Henry VII and the King and Queen of Spain, this reason ceased when the Marriage was consummated, since Henry VII and Isabella were now dead. In fine, it was alleged, that Henry VIII having protested against his marriage before consummation, thereby renounced the liberty granted him by the Bull, and therefore another Bull was necessary to render the Marriage valid. But all these reasons were produced only to afford the Pope a pretence to revoke Julius's dispensation. For, if the contrariety of the Dispensation to the divine Law, was not the real foundation of suing for the Divorce, nothing would have been more easy for the Pope, than to quiet the King's Conscience, by confirming whatever had been done, by a new Bull.

Mean while, as the Pope's compliance was not desired in his present circumstances, the King sent his Knight Secretary of State to Rome, to desire him to sign four Instruments drawn in England. The first was a Commission to Cardinal Wolsey, to try and decide the affair with some English Bishops. The second was a Bull Decretal, declaring the King's Marriage with Catherine void, because Arthur's with the same Princess was consummated. By the third, the Pope granted the King a Dispensation to marry another Wife. By the fourth, he promised never to repeal any of the three foregoing Acts.

Knight departed from England in July, about the time the Cardinal began his journey to confer with the King of France (2). But as the Pope was Prisoner, and guarded by a Spanish Captain, it was impossible for Knight to have an audience. He found means however to convey to him a Memorial (3), containing the sum of his Commission, to which the Pope returned a favorable answer. He made believe he would grant whatever the King desired, though the Emperor had already required him by the General of the Franciscans, not to do any thing in that affair, without communicating it to his Ministers. By the way, this shows, Henry had resolved long before to sue for his divorce, since the Emperor had time to hear of it, and send to the Pope. As it was not practicable for Knight to treat with the Pope in Person, the matter was carried no farther at that time. At length, the news of the Pope's going to be released, reaching England, Cardinal Wolsey writ to Sir George Casali (4) the King's ordinary Ambassador at Rome, to order him to join with Knight, and press the Pope to grant the King's request. This Letter was worded in very strong terms, and showed the Cardinal's desire that the Divorce should be effected. It was dated the 5th of December 1527, the Cardinal not yet knowing, that the Pope had made his escape the 9th of the same month (5).

Clement VII being retired to Orvieto, Knight went (6) and talked with him about the affair. The Pope owned he had received his Memorial, and promised again to do all that lay in his power for the King's satisfaction, but prayed him not to be too hasty. His circumstances then were such, that he did not yet know, whether he should want the King of England, or whether the Emperor would agree with him. Wherefore he desired to gain time, in order to proceed as should best suit with his interest. But for that reason, and because the King's orders were urgent and positive, Knight would not delay his Negotiation. He earnestly pressed the Pope, who promised at last to sign the Acts, on condition no use should be made of them, till the Germans and Spaniards were departed out of Italy. Knight willingly accepted of the condition, imagining, when the Instruments ready signed were in the King's hands, he would use them when he pleased. But the Pope was not easily to be deceived. Whilst he feigned to have no other view than to satisfy the King, he was only contriving to gain time, being ready to sacrifice him if he found it for his advantage. He used therefore all his art to prolong the affair, by means unsuspected by the King. To this end, he told Knight that before the Instruments were executed, he should be glad to talk with the Cardinal Santerum Quatuor.

The Pope having thus engaged, Knight and Casali fancied they had no more to do, than to propound in the King's favour the Cardinal, whom the Pope intended to consult. They were at no great pains to succeed, since, besides ten thousand Ducats which they had in hand to reward such as should do them service, they were empowered to make what farther promises, they should think fit, in the King's name. The Cardinal examining the Instruments sent from England, found very great faults, particularly in the Legate's Commission, and took upon him to draw one more perfect. Which done, Knight and Casali waited on the Pope, and pressed him to sign. He did not absolutely refuse, but said, The Emperor having required him not to act in that business without imparting it to him, it was necessary to find some expedient to excuse so hastily a proceeding: That therefore it would be proper to cause Lautrec to march towards Orvieto, and press him in his master's name to 1527. give the King of England satisfaction. Lautrec being then at Bologna, to get him to march to Orvieto, there would have been occasion for orders from the Court of Rome, which would have taken up much time. Whereupon Henry's Agents rejected the expedient, their aim being to finish the affair before the Emperor had notice thereof. At last the Pope, finding himself extremely pressed, delivered to them the Commission for Cardinal Wolsey, with the Bull of Dispensation for the King (1), and permitted to send into England the Bull Decretal to his two Marriages (2). But here the Pope used an artifice, which the Agents perhaps did not sufficiently consider. He stated these two Instruments from the time he was Prisoner in the Castle of St. Angelo. So, when the King had them in his power, he did not think it to make use of them, lest it should be objected that the Pope had granted them only with design to obtain his Liberty by the assistance he expected from England. Besides, all Acts executed by a Prisoner may be deemed void, whereof the Treaty of Madrid was a late instance. Thus, how urgent soever the King was to end the affair, he found at the close of the year 1527, that he had yet made no progress.

1528. Clement VII had time, during his Captivity, seriously to reflect upon his past Conduct, which had been very unsuccessful, because he had swerved from the maxims of his most able Predecessors. He had preposterously engaged in a War with the Emperor, whereas Alexander VI, Julius II, and Leo X, after sowing dissension among the Princes, left them for the most part to decide their quarrels, and then sided with the strongest, or if they engaged in a War, it was commonly at other people's expense. But for once, Clement VII, after draining his Treasury in maintaining an army, had lost Florence, Padua, Reggio, Rome itself, with the best part of the Ecclesiastical State, and seen himself captive and vanquished. This was sufficient to make him wiser, and take another course. As soon as the Ambassadors of France, England, and Spain, saw him secure at Orvieto from the outrages of the Imperialists, they pressed him to declare against the Emperor. They thought if he could not assist the League with temporal Arms, he might at least, by means of his spiritual, embroil the common enemy, whom he seemed to have no reason to regard. But he himself considered this affair in a different light. Having learned by sad experience, that he had been the dupe of his Allies, he resolved to be no longer guided by their interested Councils. So, without discovering his thoughts, he only told them, that his joining in the League would only draw upon him fresh mischiefs, without procuring them any advantage: That besides, it was necessary for the benefit of Christianity, there should be a Mediator to labour to procure Peace, and that was all he could do in the state he was reduced to. Nevertheless, he intimated to them, that he might take other measures, if Lautrec approached to oblige the Emperor's Troops to abandon Rome. This indeed was his sole aim, to free the ecclesiastical State from that foreign Army, in order to be able to act most agreeably to his interest.

At last, Lautrec departing from Bologna the 9th of January, took the road to Naples, having first sent the Prince of Andemont and la Trimouille to the Pope, to press him to declare. But Clement found means to excuse himself, without however a positive denial. He saw, as I may say, all Europe in motion, and was willing to wait the success of the War, in order to take juster measures than before. So, it was not possible by any means to bring him to a Declaration. He only made believe, that if France and Henry would cause Ravenna and Cervia to be restored to him, he would join with them. This was an advantage he would willingly have reaped from their influence, without being declared from finding some other expedient, to prevent his declaring after the recovery of these two places. Mean while, he was thinking how to treat secretly with the Emperor, from whom he had greater expectations than from his Allies. Indeed, his chief aim being to restore the House of the Medici to the Government of Florence, he perceived that he could not accomplish it without the Emperor's help, since the Allies were concerned to support the Florentines, who were become Parties in the League. But it would have been imprudent in him to declare for the Emperor, when that Monarch was weak in Italy, and so powerful an army was marching to invade the Kingdom of Naples. It was therefore necessary for him to wait, till the event of the War enabled him to resolve with safety. This was the true reason which obliged him to use many artifices, to try to displease neither the Emperor, nor the King of France, nor the King of England. If, instead of unadvisedly engaging in a War, he had before taken this course, he might have sold his favours at any rate. At least, he would not have had the mortification to be a captive in Rome itself.

But though the Pope refused to declare, the Kings of France and England were not the less eager in the pursuit of their Projects. On the 31st of January 1528, their Ambassadors in Spain demanded the Emperor's leave to retire, and next day Clarenceux and Guienne, Heralds, one of England, the other of France, proclaimed war against him. This was done with great solemnity, the Emperor being seated on his Throne, and attended by all his Grandees. He answered each in particular, but in a very different manner. Speaking to the English Herald, he made use of civil and honorable Terms, denoting, he was not at all pleased with having the King his master for an enemy. He complained however, that Henry had used him ill, in designing to give him in marriage a Princess whom he proposed to bastardize, since he was suing to be divorced from the Queen her Mother. But he threw all the blame on the boundless ambition of Cardinal Wolsey.

He said, the Cardinal would have obliged him to employ his arms in Italy to make him Pope, and thought himself injured, because he would not disturb the Peace of Christianity for his sake. As for the Sums, of which Henry demanded payment, he denied, he had ever refused to discharge the debt. But added, that the English Ambassadors not having brought with them the original obligations, nor even a power to give him a discharge, Henry was in the wrong to complain. As to the Indemnity he demanded, he knew the King of France had taken it upon him in the Treaty of Madrid. As for the penalty of five hundred thousand Crowns, in case he refused to marry the Princess Mary, he replied, it was not his fault: That he had demanded her of the King her Father, by Ambassadors sent on purpose, and that Henry had refused to send her: That besides, before that time Henry had offered her to the King of Scotland: In short, That he could not lawfully claim that Sum, before he had proved that he had himself performed all the Articles of the Treaty of Windsor. Such was the Emperor's answer to the Declaration of War made by Henry's Herald. In his answer to the French Herald, he spoke not with so much regard and caution. He plainly accused Francis of breach of faith, and charged the Herald to put him in mind of the message he sent him by the Archbishop of Bordeaux his Ambassador, That it would be better for them to decide their quarrel by single Combat, but that he had not received any answer. Probably, the Ambassador had not thought fit to deliver that Message to the King, since he seemed extremely surprized when he heard it from the Herald's mouth. In a few days, he sent the same Herald to the Emperor, with a Challenge under his own hand, wherein he gave him the Lie in form, and required him to assure him the field to fight hand to hand. The Challenge was dated March 28. 1528. The Emperor sent his answer by one of his Heralds, who was charged to tell him by word of mouth very disagreeable things. The Herald coming to Paris, could not obtain leave without great difficulty, to put on (3) his Coat of Arms when he entered the City. The King expected him on his Throne, surrounded with a great number of Princes and Lords. But he had scarce begun to speak, before the King interrupted him, and demanded whether he had brought the Security of the Field. The Herald desired leave to proceed with what he had to say from the Emperor; the King refused to hear him, saying, he had required only the Security of the Field, and that all the rest was to no purpose. Thus ended this affair, which had now made great noise. The two Monarchs gave public marks of their Courage, by their mutual Challenges, and yet there was no great labour required to prevent them from deciding their quarrel in a way so uncommon to great Princes.

Hugo de Mendoza the Emperor's Ambassador at London, hearing what had passed in Spain, would have retired. But Cardinal Wolsey (4) sent him word that Clarenceux had exceeded his Instructions in proclaiming War against the Emperor, and should be punished at his return. Whereupon the Ambassador sent an Express to inform the Emperor of what the Cardinal had said. Clarenceux, who was still in Spain, surprized that he should be made accountable for what he had express orders, demanded, and obtained an authentick Copy of the Ambassadors Letter (1). Upon his arrival in England, he waited on the King (2), before he spoke with the Cardinal, and showed him the Letter, with three others, writ with the Cardinal's own hand, whereby he gave him express orders to declare War against the Emperor. Henry, astonished at his Minister's presumption, fell into a great passion with him before the whole Court. Nay, he would perhaps have entirely disgraced him, had he not been withheld by the consideration of the affair of the Divorce, where he could not proceed without him. He made him however undergo a terrible mortification, by causing this affair to be examined in the Council. This Inquiry would doubtless have been fatal to the Minister, if the King had been pleased to pursue it, but he was contented with the Cardinal's protestation, that he thought to have acted agreeably to his Majesty's Intentions.

The Emperor's answer to Claireaux being made publick in England, by the Spanish Ambassadors means, the Cardinal was afraid it would cause ill effects among the people, considering the weakness of the motives alleged by the King for undertaking the War. For this reason he assembled in the Star-Chamber (3) all the great Lords then at Court (4), to whom he made a Speech, aggravating as much as possible the Injuries, the King had received from the Emperor, and his reasons to demand satisfaction by Arms. But let him say what he would, though every one outwardly applauded him, what the Emperor said to the Herald, that the War was caused only by the Cardinal's private discontent, made deeper Impression than all the Arguments the Minister could allege (5). The people openly exclaimed against a War which was going to ruin the Kingdom, to gratify the Favorite's passion. Nay, some went farther than murmurs. As the Trade with the Low-Countries was interrupted by the Declaration of War, and the Merchants would buy no more Cloth which they could not vend, the Clothiers rise in arms (6). Whereupon the Cardinal ordered the Merchants to buy the Cloths as usual, threatening in case of refusal to buy them himself, and sell them to the Foreigners. But they made a Jest of this threat, and continued obstinate, resolving not to render themselves liable to inevitable Losses for his sake. An Embassy from the Governors of the Low-Countries (7) to the King whilst these things were in agitation, freed the Cardinal from his embarrassment. The Ambassadors acquainting him, that if the King pleased to consent to a Truce with the Low-Countries, for the mutual benefit of Trade, the Governors would readily agree to it; this overture being debated in Council, it was resolved, notwithstanding the French Ambassador's opposition, to agree to a Truce for eight months, which was signed the 5th of June.

Whilst these things passed in England, the affairs of Italy were in such a situation as gave Francis room to expect Lautrec's Expedition in the Kingdom of Naples would be crowned with success, though afterwards it ended very unfortunately for him. Lautrec going from Bologna the 9th of January, arrived the 10th of February on the borders of Naples, and marching into Abruzzo, became master of that Province, and afterwards of part of Apulia. It was not without extreme difficulty, that the Prince of Orange obliged the Imperialists to quit Rome, where for ten Months they had exercised all sorts of Rapine and Violence. Though the Imperial Army went not from Rome till the 17th of February, they got before Lautrec, who had taken a longer way in order to procure Money, which he wanted exceedingly, the King of France, according to Custom, not having felt him what he had promised. The Imperialists being posted at Troya, he offered them battle, but as they thought proper to retire to Naples, pursued his march, and arrived in the beginning of May before that Capital, which he besieged in form according to his orders. Sixteen French Gallies commanded by Andrea Doria, eight more under the Conduct of Philippino Doria his Nephew, with twenty two from Venice, were to block up Naples by Sea, whilst Lautrec with thirty thousand Men besieged the City by Land. But when he opened the Siege he had only Philippe's eight Gallies. Those of Venice came very late, and Andrea Doria who was displeased with the King of France, and had thoughts of entering into the Emperor's Service, detour'd the sixteen Gallies at Genoa, under divers pretences. Mean while, a Sea-fight between Philippino and the Imperials, wherein Moncada was slain, and the Marquis del Infant taken prisoner, made Lautrec hope he should reduce Naples by Famine, though himself wanted all things in his Camp. His hopes were increased by the arrival of the two and twenty Venetian Gallies, which joined those of Philippino. The business now was to see who could bear Famine longest, the Besiegers or the Besieged, who were equally in want of Provisions. But the French had, besides Scarcity, a very great disadvantage, as the Plague made terrible ravage among them, and continually diminished their number. At length, Andrea Doria having agreed with the Emperor, recalled his Nephew Philippino with his eight Gallies. Shortly after, the Venetian Gallies being obliged to go upon the Coast of Calabria to protect themselves with Biskets, the Besieged took that opportunity to convey into the City abundance of Provisions, whilst Lautrec remained in a very bad condition, without Victuals or Money, and with an Army grievously afflicted with the Plague. Most of his general Officers were dead, or sick, and to complete the misfortune, he was himself seized with the Pestilence, which carried him off the 16th of August (8). The Marquis of Salazara, who took upon him the Command of the ruined Army, resolving at last to raise the Siege, with great difficulty retired to Aversa, where he was immediately besieged, and in few days, forced to capitulate, surrendering himself with all the principal Officers of his Army, into the hands of the Imperialists. Thus, the fine Army Lautrec had led before Naples, was entirely dispersed. Moreover, France had lately lost Genoa, taken by Andrea Doria, in the Emperor's name, after which, pursuant to his agreement with that Monarch, he restored his Country to Liberty, and established a Government which still subsists to this day. Thus the affairs of Italy, which in the beginning of the year had so promising an aspect for Francis, were so entirely altered, that he had scarce any thing left in that Country.

The knowledge of what passed in Italy this Campaign, will be of no little service to discover the motives of the Pope's Conduct in the affair of the Divorce. Henry deemed the affair ended, when he heard the Pope had left it to Cardinal Wolsey's decision. But when, after much difficulty, he had obtained this Commission for the Cardinal, with a Bull Decretal, declaring the Marriage void, and a Dispensation to marry again, he found however there was yet nothing done. The Commission was dated from the Castle of St. Angelo, whilst the Pope was a prisoner, which rendered it entirely null, and consequently there was a necessity of renewing it. The Decretal had no Clause to hinder the Pope from revoking it if he pleased. In fine, the Dispensation was only conditional, in case the King's Marriage with Catherine should be declared void. Besides, there were certain restrictions inserted, leaving the Pope at liberty to repeal it. For Instance, he granted the Dispensation, as far as might be without offending God. Notwithstanding any prohibitions of the divine Laws, or other Constitutions and Ordinances whatsoever to the contrary, as far as the authority Apostolical reached (9). Henry was not a little concerned to see that he could not use these Bulls, without being liable to be molested. Nevertheless, in the belief, that all this was owing to Inadvertency, he ordered Sir Gregory Cassali his Ambassador at Rome, to demand Bulls less liable to dispute. Cassali spoke of it frequently to the Pope, but could obtain no positive answer. Only the Pope finding himself pressed, told him as a Secret, that he advised the King to proceed, and get his Marriage annulled, by virtue of the Commission given the Legate (10), but with as little noise as possible, and marry the Woman desired. He grounded this advice upon its being much easier to confirm a thing when done, than to permit him to do it. He charged Cassali however, not to let the King know, this Suggestion came from him. Henry looked upon this advice as a Snare laid for him by the Pope. He considered, it was not possible to have such a Cause tried without noise, since it was necessary the Queen should be heard, otherwise the Sentence would be evidently void. In the next place, had he done what he was advised to, he would have been entirely at the Pope's Mercy, who, according to the opinion of the Canonists, might have refused to confirm the Legate's Sentence, as well as the consequent Marriage. So, the affair being taken into consideration, it was thought more proper to apply directly to the Pope for new Bulls. Pursuant to this resolution, the King sent (1) Stephen Gardiner, Cardinal Wolsey's Secretary, and Edward Fox (2), to manage the affair. Their Instructions were to demand for the Cardinal a new Commission, appointing him Judge of the Cause, with Powers to null the King's Marriage, if he thought proper, and yet to declare his Daughter legitimate; to press the Pope to give him a promise under his hand, not to revoke the Legate's Commission; to demand a Bull Decretal to null the King's Marriage, and a Dispensation to espouse another Wife without any restriction. In short, the Envoys had orders to acquaint the Pope, that the Divorce was not advised by the Cardinal, and to display the extraordinary Merit of the Lady the King intended to espouse. This was Ann Bullen, as may easily be guessed, since the King no longer concealed his love for her. It was very proper to tell the Pope, that the Cardinal was not Author of the Council which had induced the King to sue for a Divorce, since he was required for Judge. And yet the Letters he sent by Gardiner and Fox, and which are in the History of the Reformation, clearly show he was infinitely desirous the thing should succeed. Finally, it appears that the King was still willing to have some concession for the Queen and the Emperor her Nephew, since he required that the Legate should have Powers to declare Mary legitimate. Perhaps too this was an effect of the love he had for her.

His Interest and Projects.

When Gardiner and Fox came to Orvieto (3), Lautrec was marching to Naples. But his progress was yet so inconsiderable, that it was difficult to judge of the Success of his undertaking, especially as the Imperialists were now departed from Rome in order to oppose his passage. Nay, it was likely, there would be a Battle, and as the Event was doubtful, the Pope took care not to incur the Emperor's resentment, in case his Arms were victorious. So, to gain time, he sent the King a Letter in Cypher, as if he meant to acquaint him with a Secret, and yet it was not possible to discover his Intention. This Letter not being very welcome, the Envoys had orders to insist upon their demands. But, at that time the face of affairs was something changed. Lautrec had now made Conquests in the Kingdom of Naples, and the Prince of Orange, unable to stop his march, was retired to the Metropolis, which probably, was going to be invested. It would therefore have been very imprudent to disoblige Henry, when the King of France his Ally was upon the point of becoming very powerful in Italy. So, Clement being greatly embarrassed in so nice a juncture, had recourse to his usual artifices, to try to gain time. He feigned to desire nothing so ardently as to satisfy Henry, though he was resolved in his own mind to do nothing effectual in his favour. His aim was to become master of the affair of the Divorce, and prolong it till the events of the War should determine him to content either the Emperor or the King. The Interest of his House required that he should manage the Emperor, because it was by his means that he hoped to restore the Medici's to Florence. That of his See was no less important. Henry demanded that he should revoke a Dispensation granted by a Pope his Predecessor, upon the supposition that this Pope had not power to grant it, that is, properly speaking, that he should declare the Roman Pontiffs had hitherto assumed a Privilege which belonged not to them. This was a very difficult step to be taken, at a time when great part of Germany had thrown off the Pope's Dominion, and nothing was every where heard but complaints and murmurs against the exorbitant Power they had usurped. So, Clement's real design was to amuse the King with hopes he would consent to his Divorce, till it was in his power to oppose it with safety. There is no occasion to look for other mysteries in the Pope's Conduct, as will more plainly appear in the Sequel. As for the Arguments and Authorities alledged on both fides, with respect to the main point in question, from the Holy Scriptures, the Fathers, and the Canons, they were only so many amusements which were extremely subversive to the Pope's designs, but made little or no impression upon him.

Clement VII., being in this disposition, scrupled not outwardly to grant the King whatever he required. On the 13th of April 1528, he signed a Bull, appointing Cardinal Wolsey Judge of the Cause, jointly with the Archbishop of Canterbury, or any other English Prelate he should think fit to chuse, and gave him as ample Powers as the King desired. But besides the above-mentioned Inconveniences in the Decretal and Dispensation, the King's Council found two in Cardinal Wolsey's new Commission. The first was, That there was no Clause to hinder the Pope, from revoking it. The second, That to appoint for sole Judge of the Cause, a Cardinal devoted to the King, and actually his Prime Minister, would be a manifest nullity. These considerations obliged the King to desire the Pope that he would join another Legate with Cardinal Wolsey, and positively promise not to revoke the Commission. As, when this was demanded, Lautrec was now before Naples, and it was not doubted, he would become master of the City, as well as of all the rest of the Kingdom, the Pope granted whatever was desired (4). He appointed therefore by a Bull dated at Orvieto the 6th of June, Thomas Wolsey Cardinal of Tork, and Lorenzo Campeggio Cardinal Bishop of Salisbury for his Legates a latere, giving them the same Powers he had granted to Wolsey alone, appointing them his Vicegerents in the affair of the Divorce, and committing to them his whole Authority (5). He gave likewise, the 13th of July, the promise under his hand desired by the King. In a word, he delivered to Campeggio a Decretal, nulling the King's Marriage, expressed in the very Terms which had as it were been dictated to him. It seemed Henry could desire nothing more. But all the artifices of the Court of Rome were not yet known in England. The Pope only intended to gain time, in order to see the Issue of the Naples Expedition. To that end, he always placed some interval between his Favours to the King. Wolsey was made sole Judge in the affair of the Divorce, the 13th of April; Campeggio was, in a Conistory, declared his Associate, about the end of the same month; but the Bull was not drawn till the 6th of June. His promise not to revoke the Commission was not signed before the 23d of July. In all appearance, the Decretal was not drawn till August, nor did Campeggio begin his Journey till after Lautrec's death, or perhaps after the raising the Siege of Naples; that is, when the Pope was no longer in dread of France, and it was more necessary than ever to manage the Emperor. So, it may almost be affirmed, that when Campeggio departed from Rome, the Pope was resolved not to grant the Divorce. It was however requisite, he should still seem willing to satisfy Henry, in order not to be delivered to the Emperor's Mercy, with whom he was determined to agree, and nothing was more capable to procure him advantageous Terms, than his seeming Union with France and England. This was most certainly the Secret of the Pope's Policy, and the real motive of all his artifices in this affair. In pursuance therefore of the resolution he had taken, he gave the following Instructions to his Legate. First, to prolong the affair as much as possible. Secondly, not to give Sentence upon the Divorce before the reception of his Commands in writing. Thirdly, he expressly enjoined him not to show the Bull to any person but the King and Cardinal Wolsey, nor to part with it out of his hands, without his order, upon any pretence whatever.

Campeggio departing with these Instructions, arrived not in England till October, six or seven months after he was appointed Legate. Whilst he was on the road, the Emperor's Ministers at Rome raised a fresh obstacle to the Divorce, by the pretended discovery of a Brief of Julius II. (6), confirming the Bull of dispensation for Henry's marriage with Catherine. But there was this difference between the Bull and the Brief, that the Pope in the Bull said, The Marriage was perhaps consummated; whereas in the Brief, the word perhaps was omitted. They inferred from thence, that Julius II. was not surprised, since he looked upon Catherine's first Marriage as consummated. But this Brief, of which they only gave an authentic Copy, without showing the original to the King's Ministers, was, probably, proposed solely to cause time to be lost in examining it. For, there were two reasons, among many others, which manifestly proved it to be a Forgery. The first was, That this Brief granted at Catherine's request, supposed that Prince's marriage with Arthur to have been consummated, and yet she had sworn the contrary. And upon that her Agents had grounded the validity of Julius's dispensation. The second reason was still more strong, namely, That the Brief was dated the 26th of December 1503. Now as in the date of the Briefs, the Court of Rome begins the year the 25th of December, being Christmas-day, this date answered to the 26th of December 1502, of the common year, that is, ten months before Julius II. was Pope.

Campegio being arrived in England, began his Legation with gravely exhorting the King to live in good understanding with the Queen, and desist from a further prosecution of this matter. This was taken very ill from a Legate who was thought to be sent into England to judge the Cause in favour of the King. After that, he talked the quite contrary to the Queen, endeavouring to persuade her, that she ought to comply with the King's desire (1), and even intimated, it would be in vain to oppose it. But whether the Queen was told beforehand what she was to say, or naturally spoke her own thoughts, she answered, She was the King's Wife, and would be so, till parted from him by the Pope's Sentence (2). Campegio not being able to prevail with the King or Queen, affirmed, he could not proceed without fresh orders, as if his whole Commission was only to make these exhortations. But it was six months before his Instructions arrived. Mean while, he kept the King in hopes of obtaining his desires, and even insinuated, that he was himself satisfied of the Justice of his Cause. To amuse him the better, he showed him the Bull he had brought with him, and gave the Cardinal his College a sight of it also. But when he was pressed to show it to some Lords of the Council, he replied, he had very positive orders to let no person see it but the King and Wolsey. Henry surprised and angry at such a proceeding, complained of it to the Pope, who, instead of blaming his Legate, answered, He had done very well to follow his orders: That the Decretal was granted on condition it was shown to none but the King and Cardinal Wolsey, and on purpose to prevent Wolsey's ruin, which otherwise, he was told, would be infallible: That in fine, the Bull was not to be published, unless the Legates gave Sentence for the King (3).

Whilst Campegio amused Henry in England, the Pope was taking measures to conclude his Treaty with the Emperor, and seeking pretences to leave the Kings of France and England, whom he no longer feared, since the Naples Expedition had miscarried. He complained that these two Monarchs had disappointed him, in not causing Ravenna and Cervia to be restored to him according to their promise; thereby insinuating, that it was not to be thought strange, he made no haste to satisfy Henry, since that Prince had neglected to do him Justice by the Venetians (4). He would fain have had it believed, that the affair of the Divorce was retarded solely on that account, and was very desirous to have these two places in his power, before he concluded with the Emperor. But, what caution forever he used, his Negotiation in Spain could not be so private, but Francis and Henry had some intelligence of it. They complained to him by their Ambassadors, but he constantly denied he intended to depart from his neutrality. Mean while, under colour of removing these groundless suspicions, he dispatched into England one Campana, to give the King fresh assurances of his good intentions, but withal, sent by him express orders to Cardinal Campegio, to burn the Bull Decretal, and defer the sentence of the Divorce as long as possible. Campegio immediately obeyed the first of these orders, and as for the second, never ceased finding fresh pretences to retard the proceedings.

At last, Henry tired to see so many affected delays, and perceiving they came from the Pope, sent, about the end of the year, Sir Francis Brian and Peter Vannes (5) to Rome, to discover the true Cause. They had likewise several other Commissions. First, to search the Pope's Records for the pretended Brief of Julius II. Secondly, to propose, as of themselves, several expedients, speedily to end the affair of the Divorce, and to consult, under feigned names, the Canonists of Rome, whether they were practicable. Thirdly, in case they saw the Pope over-awed by the Emperor's threats, they had orders to offer him a Guard of two thousand Men. Lastly, if this had no effect, they were to balance the Emperor's menaces with others from the King. They found the Pope in a real or pretended Fright, at the Emperor's Ministers threats to have him deposed for a Baffard. His answer therefore to the offer of the two thousand Men for a Guard, was, that it would not be capable of securing him, but rather render him more suspected. He took care not to put himself in the King's power, when he was thinking to break entirely with him. The two Envoys seeing the Pope leaned to the Emperor's side, plainly told him at last, "That if he continued to deny the King their Master the satisfaction he demanded, he might be assured England would be lost to him: That the English were already but too much disposed to withdraw their obedience from the Holy See, and upon the least encouragement from the King, would openly publish what they yet kept concealed in their hearts: That the King their Master, and the King of France, were powerful and very friendly united, and therefore the Pope would run a great hazard, if he should caulelessly make these two Monarchs his Enemies: that though the Naples expedition had miscarried, he could not be sure it would be the same with those that should be hereafter undertaken; nay, it was easy to see, by the dangerous state of the Emperor's affairs, what might happen another time: That if out of excessive confidence for the Emperor, he dealt so unjustly by the King of England, as to refuse him what even Equity and the Law of God required, he must likewise expect no favour or regard, when affairs should be altered: That he ought to consider, the King of England had engaged in this war to free him from captivity, and if, instead of making a grateful return, he should join with his enemy, all Christians would abhor his ingratitude." All this was not capable to divert the Pope from his design, and yet he would still be thought unruffled. He replied with a sigh, That he was between the Hammer and the Anvil, and which way soever he turned, saw nothing before him but dangers; and therefore he placed all his hopes in the protection of God, who would not forsake his Church: That as to the rest, he had done for the King of England more than could be reasonably expected, in committing the trial of his Cause to two Legates, who were both devoted to him: That not content with this, he still pressed him to do more, and to disregard the customary Rules of the Church on the like occasions, and publicly sacrifice to him, the Emperor, the Archduke his Brother, Queen Catherine, the Honour, Dignity and Interest of the Holy See: That this was asking too much, and the King should at least suffer the affair to be decided by the Legates, appointed for that purpose: That it was not his fault if matters were delayed, and in case it was owing to Campegio's negligence, he had acted contrary to his orders. This answer was a plain indication of the Pope's thoughts. Accordingly, the Envoys told the King, nothing was to be expected from the Pope, and that the only way was to cause the Legates to give a speedy Sentence. The truth is, the Pope was now resolved to agree with the Emperor; and if he shewed any farther regard for Henry, it was only to avoid an open rupture with him, for fear the Emperor should take advantage of it in the Treaty they were concluding.

The Expedients Brian and Vannes were commissioned to propose, were, 1. Whether, if the Queen vowed Religion, the King should have liberty to marry again? 2. Or if the King should vow Religion as well as the Queen, whether the Pope would dispense with his Vow, and allow him to take another Wife whilst the Queen was alive? 3. Or whether the Pope would grant him a Dispensation to have two Wives? But it does not appear how these points were decided. As for the Brief produced by the Imperial Ministers, there was not the least trace of any such thing among the Pope's Records, of which the English Envoys (6) had good Certificates. In this manner passed the whole year 1528, at the close whereof the King found himself no more advanced than at the beginning, except that he had still some hope from Campegio, who all along pretended to be entirely in his interest. It may be affirmed, that Francis, in neglecting to assist Lautrec, was the cause of the Turn which the affair 1528. of the divorce took, since he thereby gave occasion to the Pope to join with the Emperor (1).

Whilst the King was thinking of his divorce, Cardinal Wolsey was very diligently employed in founding his Colleges. As the Pope made the King very uneasy by his affected delays, he endeavoured to gratify him otherwise, in granting his Favorite whatever he desired for his Foundations. Among the Publick Acts of the year 1528, there are ten or twelve Bulls, as well for the suppression of several small Monasteries (2), as for other things concerning the two Colleges, the endowment whereof the Cardinal so passionately desired. Wherefore, knowing how fair an opportunity presented to obtain private favours from the Pope, he forgot not to improve it. Had he stayed a year longer, he would have run great risk of leaving the Work unfinished.

I have for some time been silent concerning the affairs of Scotland, because there has been no occasion to speak of them. But as their situation was changed during the Course of this year, it is necessary briefly to relate what had passed in that Country. The Earl of Angus, George Douglas's his Brother, and their Uncle Archibald, had still the King's person in their power, and governed in his name. Queen Margaret however, who had caused her marriage with the Earl of Angus to be annulled, and was married again to Henry Stewart, had still a powerful Party in Scotland. But as her Party could not act openly without being liable to be deemed Rebels, since the King was in the hands of the Douglas's, the Queen made use of another expedient to accomplish her designs. She persuaded the King her Son, by some Persons about him, to make his escape and retire to Sterling. The contrivance succeeded according to her Wish. James took his opportunity, and escaping from the Earl of Angus, withdrew to Sterling, where it was published that the Douglas's should be no longer acknowledged for Regents, and withal were forbidden the Court. This Order was notified to the Earl of Angus, whilst he was marching to recover the King's Person. As he had but few Troops, and was unable to enter Sterling by force, where several great Men were come to the King's relief, he obeyed and retired.

Shortly after, the King called a Parliament at Edinburgh the third of September, and came himself to hold it. The Douglas's, perceiving what was preparing against them, attempted to surprize Edinburgh, and become masters of the King's Person, with design to dissolve the Parliament. But being repulged, they were forced to retire. Whereupon the Parliament confiscated their Estates to the King. But they continued in Arms, and made Incursions, even to the Gates of Edinburgh.

Henry being informed of what passed in Scotland, and fearing the young King might suffer himself to be prejudiced against him, thought it advisable to send Ambassadors to make Peace, since a War with Scotland could not be but very inconvenient in his present circumstances. But it was not possible to succeed. A Truce only for five years was concluded at Berwick, and signed the fourteenth of December. It was agreed by a separate Article, that the Douglas's might take refuge in England, on condition they delivered to their Sovereign the places they held in Scotland; and in case they entered the Kingdom, and committed any disorders, Henry should be responsible as if done by his own Subjects (3).

Since the Pope had determined to agree with the Emperor, his feeding the Allies with hopes, was only to obtain the better Terms from that Monarch. On the other hand, Francis suspecting the Pope's Intentions, perceived likewise that a Peace only would procure him his Sons, and therefore continued a secret Negotiation with the Emperor. But at the same time, he made great promises to the Venetians, Florentines, Duke of Milan, and the Pope himself, to let the Emperor see, in case he did not make haste and conclude, it would perhaps be too late when he desired it. About the same time, the Emperor had certain advice, that the Turks were making great preparations to invade Hungary, and penetrate even into Germany. So finding that a diversion in Italy might greatly embarrass him at such a juncture, he was the more inclined to Peace. These dispositions in the principal Parties, could not in the end but produce the Peace which was universally expected with impatience. Mean while, the War was continued, though faintly, in the Kingdom of Naples and the Duchy of Milan, where the French and Venetians had kept some places, but it was only to see that nothing decisive would happen.

In the mean time, the Pope was wholly intent upon his own private affairs. His aim was not only to be restored to Florence, but also to become master of Perugia and Forliva, and recover Ravenna and Genua, taken by the Venetians during his Captivity. Under colour of using his Interest to procure a general Peace, he had sent a Nuncio to Spain, to conclude a private Treaty with the Emperor. During the Negotiation, the affair of the Divorce was at a stand. Clement VII was fully resolved to satisfy the Emperor, and by that Henry daily lost the hopes of succeeding in his pursuit. Mean while, a violent distemper, which seized the Pope in the beginning of the year 1529, had like to have very much changed the face of affairs (4). Cardinal Wolsey having notice of the Pope's dangerous illness, had sent an Expres to Gardiner, to conjure him to neglect nothing that he thought capable of procuring him the Papacy. Henry himself had writ to several Cardinals in his behalf, and the King of France, who was not yet secure of a Peace, had given him all those of his Faction. It is pretended, Wolsey would have been sure of more than a third of the Votes, in case the Pope had died. Indeed that was not sufficient to make him Pope; but it was enough to hinder any other from being so. This affair was even carried so far, that the King had ordered his Ambassadors at Rome, that if, notwithstanding the Cardinals of Wolsey's Faction, another Person should be designed, they should so manage, that these Cardinals should protest against the proceedings in the Conclave, and then withdrawing to some secure place, should themselves come to a new Election. I do not know, whether it would have been easy for the Ambassadors to obtain so absolute a resignation to the King's pleasure. However, it is not strange that Henry should be so very desirous of procuring the Papacy for his Minister and Favorite. But it is surprising, that a Prince who was called Protector of the Church, and Defender of the Faith, should not scruple purposely to endeavour to form a Schism in the Church, to gratify his passion. As for Cardinal Wolsey, nothing in his conduct ought to be thought strange; since it is certain, he was ready to sacrifice every thing to his ambition. The Pope's recovery put an end to all these cabals, which however could not be so private but they came to his knowledge. This made him consider Wolsey as a dangerous rival, and capable of supplanting him if an opportunity offered, by using for pretence the defect in his Birth.

When Clement VII was fully recovered, the proceedings for the Divorce continued upon the same foot as before. The Pope gave hopes, the affairs should be decided in England for the King, by a sentence of the Legates which he would himself confirm to make it more authentic. His aim was to gain time, and prevent the appearance of any misunderstanding between him and the Court of England, before he had concluded his Treaty with the Emperor, because it was a means to obtain better Terms. To this end, and to hinder Henry from being impatient, he had put into Gardiner's hands a Brief, promising not to revoke the powers given the Legates. But, besides that the Brief was exprest in ambiguous terms, he knew Sentence would not be passed without his positive orders. This management which the Pope continued with many artifices, afforded the King some hopes of gaining him to his interest. To succeed the better, he prevailed with the King of France to send to the Pope the Bishop of Bayonne, with orders earnestly to sollicit the decision of the affair. He could have wished that the Pope of his own accord would have granted a Bull to annul his marriage, and dispense with his taking another Wife, or at least, have given the Legates such a Commission, as it should not be in their choice to judge otherwise than in his favor. The Pope, pleased at his being so intent upon his own Projects, still fed him with hopes of Success. But withal, he exprest great fear of what the Emperor might do against him, and used that pretence to delay the favour he seemed to intend to grant. In every thing else he was always ready to content the King. The Bishoprick of Winchester being vacant by the death of Richard Fox, and Henry desiring him to bestow it on Wolsey, the Bulls for that purpose were immediately dispatched. It is true, they were rated at fifteen thousand ducats. But Wolsey would give but six thousand, alleging, he did not want them, since the King had already

But herein is nothing surprizing, since the Pope himself made no scruple to own in his Bull that he conferred this Bishoprick on the Cardinal, to help him to bear the expence to which he was obliged by his Rank.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, the Emperor haſtened, as much as poſſible, the concluſion of his Treaty with the Pope, being reſolved to grant whatever he required, rather than give him occaſion to join with his Enemies. Before the Pope was aſſured of this agreement, Policy required, he ſhould keep the Emperor in fear that the iſſue of the Divorce would be determined to the King of England's ſatisfaction. Conſequently, it was his intereſt that the affair ſhould remain undecided, to let the Emperor ſee, it depended on the ſucceſs of the Negotiation at Barcelona. But when he had juſt brought him to his own Terms, he began infernally to feek pretences to break his engagements with Henry. So, the reſtitution of Ravenna and Gerovia was again moved, the Pope feigning to believe, that if Henry had deſired it, he ſhould have had theſe two Cities before now, and from thence took occaſion to be diſpleaſed. On the other hand, the Emperor knowing the Pope's Intention, proteſted (1), in Queen Catherine's name, againſt whatever ſhould be done in England in the affair of the Divorce, declaring, that the excepted againſt the Pope's Intention, as one was notoriously devoted to the King, and the other, Biſhop of Salisbury. The King's Miniſters uſed their utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the Pope to reject the Proteſtation. But he replied, He could not, without ſhewing himſelf too partial to the King, ſince a Proteſtation was no prejudice to the Cauſe itſelf. That it would be a very ſtrange thing to reſuſe a Queen the right of proteſting, which the meaneſt Perſon could claim. All this, added to many other circumſtances, and to certain advices that the Pope was treating with the Emperor, took from the Engliſh Miniſters all hopes of prevailing with him. Wherefore, they writ to the King that they were only amuſed, and if the Proceſs was not ſpeedily the Legates seemed to suppose his Consent; it was evident the pretence of the Avocation subverted, whether the King consented or not. Consequently they afforded the Pope a plausible pretence to avocate the Cause, which the King dreaded of all things: as W^{hy} deceived by Gumgins, or did he sacrifice his Master's Interest? It is difficult to believe either; and yet Histories affirm, that one of the principal causes of his difference was a Letter he had writ to the Pope, which came to the King's knowledge by Bennet's means; and it might very well be true. Indeed, he was inexcusable if he signed it without the King's approbation; and on the other hand, it cannot be conceived that the King should be so blind as not to see the consequence of such advice.

Though Campio came to England in October last year, it was now the end of May, and nothing done towards the Trial of the Cause which brought him thither. The King, having suffered himself to be amused by the Pope whose Interest it was to gain time, had been ever in hope of obtaining a Bull to null the Marriage, without being obliged to go through the usual forms of a Process. But at length, his Agents convincing him that his Expectations were in vain, he resolved to proceed before the Legates. To this end, on the 31st of May, he granted them a License to execute the Pope's Commission. They met the same day, and appointed Associates (4) to examine the Papers and Evidences. From the very first Session, it appeared that Campio intended to prolong the Process, since after the Commission was read, he ordered the King and Queen to be cited to appear the 18th of June. This was too long a Term, if there had been any design to dispatch the Affair, especially as the Parties were in London it self, or in one of their Palaces near the City. Tho' Wolsey was the senior Cardinal, he let Campio prelude, to shew he intended to act without partiality. So, from the first day to the last, Campio did all, without Wolsey's ever appearing to oppose the affected delays of his Colleague between the Sessions. I shall not enter any farther into the particulars of this famous Process, which may be seen at large in the excellent History of the Reformation of England, known to all the World, but content my self with relating in general the most remarkable Circumstances.

In the second Session, the Queen's Proctors (5) excepted against the two Legates. But the exception not being deemed valid, he had a further day given her, to the 21st (6). On that day, the King and Queen appeared in person (7). But the Queen, without saying any thing to the Legates, went and knelt down before the King, and made a very moving Speech, concluding with imploring his Justice and Pity; after which, she withdrew, and would never more appear, nor suffer any person to defend her Cause (8). As soon as she was retired, the King declared he was very well pleased with the Queen, and in suing to be divorced from her, acted solely from a motive of Religion and Conscience (9). Adding, that his scruples concerning his Marriage sprung from those of the Bishop of Tarbe, and were confirmed by the opinion of all the Bishops of England. The Archbishop of Canterbury confirmed what the King said, concerning the Bishops. But Fisher Bishop of Rochester denied, he ever set his hand to the writing which was presented to the King. Mean while, the Queen was cited again for the 25th of June, but instead of appearing, she sent in her Appeal [to the Pope] in form, from whatever had been or should be done hereafter. Nevertheless she was declared contumacious. The same day, the Proceſs was reduced to twelve Articles, upon which witnesses were to be examined. The principal Article was, Prince Arthur's Consummation of his Marriage with Catherine, which the Queen had denied with an Oath, and which notwithstanding was proved by the Testimony of several Persons,

The Pope receives News of the Conclusion of the Treaty with the Emperor.
Burnet.

Whilst the Trial was prosecuting in England, the Emperor's Ministers were earnestly pressing the Pope to advocate the Cause to Rome, and Henry's as vehemently following the contrary. What is more, both Sides threatened to depose him, on account of his being a Bastard. The Pope feigned to be terrified by these menaces, and this seeming fear to declare for either, afforded him a pretence to remain undetermined, till he received advice of the conclusion of his Treaty with the Emperor. At length the agreeable news being come, he resolved to advocate the Cause, before the publication of the Treaty, lest it should be thought to be one of the secret Articles. Weak precaution to efface or prevent such a Suspicion.

Continuation of the Treaty.
Guicciardi.

The substance of this Treaty, which was signed at Barcelona the 29th of June, was, That the Emperor should restore the Family of the Medici to Florence, on the same foot as formerly. That he should cause Ravenna and Cervia to be delivered to the Pope: That he should put him in possession of Modena and Reggio, saving the Rights of the Empire: That he should aid him to become master of Ferrara: That Francesco Sforza should be restored to Milan, if innocent; but if guilty, the Emperor should not dispose of the Duchy to any Prince the Pope should dislike: That the Pope and Emperor should employ their Temporal and Spiritual Arms against the Hereticks of Germany: That Alexander de Medici should espouse Margaret the Emperor's natural Daughter: That the Pope should grant the Emperor a fourth of the Ecclesiastical Revenues in his Dominions, to wage War with the Turks: That he should abjure all that were any way concerned in the taking and sacking of Rome. What greater advantages could the Pope have expected, supposing he had been victorious in the late War? but the Emperor believed he could not purchase the Pope's Friendship too dear, who might still have greatly embarrassed him, if he had joined with France, England, and the Republic of Venice.

The Pope advocates the Cause to Rome.
Burnet.
Herbert.

The Pope having concluded his Treaty with the Emperor, told the English Ambassadors himself on the 9th of July, his resolution to advocate the Cause to Rome. They used all possible endeavours to dissuade him from it, representing to him that the Holy See was going irrecoverably to lose England. But it was all to no purpose. By his late Treaty with the Emperor, the Family of the Medici was to be restored to the Government of Florence. This alone was sufficient to outweigh in his Mind, all the dangers to which he exposed the Holy See; so great was his Affection for a Family from whence he was descended, though not born in Wedlock. So, the 15th of July, he signed the Bull of Avocation. Next day he notified it to Cassali the King's Ambassador in ordinary, and to Bennet who had been sent to him last. He alleged, in excuse of the Avocation, several reasons which might have been of some weight in the beginning of the Process, on supposition he had been entirely impartial, but which had lost all their force, after all his proceedings, and the conclusion of his Treaty with the Emperor. Three days after, he dispatched a Messenger with the Bull of Avocation into England, where proceedings were very dilatory by the artifices of Cardinal Campgio who prebided in the affair.

The Queen, who was cited for the 25th of June, not appearing that day, she had farther time given her to the 28th, and was summoned again to appear by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, though in vain. On the 28th, some Depositions were read, after which the Session was adjourned to the 5th of July, when by reason of certain Holidays kept at Rome, the Session was deferred till the 12th. The Court met again on the 12th, the 14th, the 17th, the 21st, and the 23d. As there was nothing more to do but to pronounce the Sentence, every one thought all would be ended this last Session; but People were strangely surprized when Cardinal Campgio was heard to adjourn the Court to the first of October. He alleged for reason, that it was the time of the great Vacation at Rome, and he was indispensably obliged to comply with that Custom (2).

Thus did that Legate, who was in the Pope's Secrets, amuse the King, in the same manner as the Pope had amused him at Rome near two years, ever since the Affair was begun. Henry was as much enraged as surprized at the proceedings of the Legates, but dissembled both his Surprize and Relentment. Shortly after, he plainly perceived to what all these affected delays tended, when he came to know that notwithstanding his Engagement, the Pope had advocated the Cause. The Bull of Avocation being arrived (3), he would not suffer it to be notified to him, but intimated to the Legates, that he was content they should obey the Pope's orders. It was not without reason that he would not have the Bull notified to him. He was cited therein to appear at Rome within forty days, which he could not have done without acting contrary to the Laws of the Land, which prohibited to obey such Citations, and carry Causes to a foreign Court. Upon this foundation it was that he had always insisted, that the Process should be determined in the Kingdom. Besides that, Censures were denounced against him in the Bull, as against a private Person, if he obeyed not the Citation. Some time after, the Pope made him a sort of reparation, in revoking these Censures by a Brief (4), where he protested they were inserted contrary to his Intention. But Ad. The figure Cardinal Wolsey made during the pretended Judgment of the Process was very extraordinary. Of all Mankind he was the proudest and most haughty; he was senior Cardinal to his Colleague, and yet gave place to him in every thing, and suffered him to act as he pleased, without ever opposing his opinion. If the Affair had succeeded according to the King's desire, his Conduct would doubtless have been praised. But as every thing turned against the King, it was not possible for the Cardinal to avoid the suspicion of betraying his Master's Interests, or at least of serving him very ill. Henry himself thought so, though he did not presently shew it (5). On the other hand, Ann Bullen, who had ever believed the Cardinal in her Interest, was extremely surprized when she was informed of what had passed. The King had removed her from Court (6) whilst the Legates were employed in the Judgment of the Process, but she was sent for the moment the Bull of Avocation was arrived. 'Tis pretended, she did not a little contribute to confirm the King's Suspensions of the Cardinal. She was persuaded, if Wolsey had pleased, the Affair would have taken another turn; but that he had altered his resolution. Whether her opinion was well-grounded, or the Vexation to see herself still so remote from her hopes, exasperated her against the Cardinal, she looked upon him as an Enemy deserving her whole Vengeance. So finding the King disposed to give ear to whatever was said against his Minister, the neglected nothing that could help to ruin him. In this she was assisted by several Persons of the highest Rank who had no reason to love that proud Prelate.

Remark on Cardinal Wolsey's Behaviour.

It is easy to guess Henry's concern to see himself on a sudden so remote from his aim. The Pope had joined in League with the Emperor, which was properly his Party. Francis I, from whom he had expected a powerful aid in case of need, had just concluded at Cambray a Treaty with the Emperor, whereby he engaged not to assist that Prince's Enemies. In a word, Queen Catherine remained obstinate not to accept any expedient that might debar her from being his Wife. On the other hand, Henry's love for Ann Bullen, which he had pleased himself with the hopes of gratifying by a lawful Marriage, helped not a little to increase his concern. He did not know which way to get rid of the Queen, who by her obstinacy, had very much lessened that Esteem and Affection he had always had for her (7). With a Mind full of these trouble-

The King's Council it seems infusing mostly on the Confirmation of the Marriage, it led them to say many things that were indecent; of which the Bishop of Rochester complained, and said they were things detestable to be heard; but Cardinal Wolsey checked him, and there passed some short Words between them. But after the suit concerning the Divorce was commenced, they parted. See Stow, p. 246. About December, Ann Bullen returned to Court, and was more waited on than the Queen had been for some Years. 1529. Statute of Præmunire, which ran, that no person should be exempt from the Penalty, but those to whom the King should be pleased to grant his Letters Patents. Now, as the Cardinal had not taken care to have a Licence in form, he was liable to the penalty, according to the rigour of the Law. But in the Articles of the House of Lords there was no such thing. And indeed, it would have been contrary to Equity to accuse the Cardinal of exercising the Authority of Legate without the King's Permission, since the King was known to consent to it, though not in the manner prescribed by the Law. The Attorney General did well to keep to the Letter of the Law, pursuant to the duty of his Office. But it would have been wrong in the House of Peers to take advantage of the want of a Formality to destroy one of their Body. So, the Articles exhibited by the Lords, ran upon Crimes which had no relation to the Statute of Præmunire. The Cardinal was chiefly accused of abusing his Legatine Power, contrary to his Oath, when admitted to the Exercise of his Legateship: Of unjust proceedings as Chancellor: Of making himself, on several occasions, equal to the King (1): Of illusing out divers orders of moment without the King's knowledge: Of acting arbitrarily on many occasions, as if he was rather Sovereign than Minister. All the rest of the Articles were of the same nature, and ran upon the ill use he had made of his Power, as Legate, Chancellor, Prime Minister, and Favorite. But I cannot pass over in Silence, a very extraordinary Article, namely, that the Cardinal knowing he had the Great Fox upon him, had the confidence daily to approach the King's Person, frequently whispering in his Ear, without fearing to infect him with his Breath. These Articles being sent down to the Commons, Thomas Cromwell Member of Parliament, and the Cardinal's Servant, so undertook his Defence, as did him great Honour, and was one of the principal causes of his future advancement. It is true, he pretended not to clear him of the Crimes he was charged with, but only to show he was not guilty of Treason, as the House of Peers asserted, wherein he succeeded to his wish.

It is necessary now to speak of the Peace of Cambray, which was only mentioned by the way. The differences between Charles V. and Francis I. so concerned all Europe, that it is very difficult to understand the Histories of the other States, without a clear notion of the affairs of these two Monarchs. Francis laboured, during the first part of the year 1529, to negotiate a Peace with the Emperor. After his ill success in the war of Naples, he saw there was no other way to recover his two Hostages. He knew the Pope continued a secret Negotiation in Spain, and that it lay in the Emperor's power to make Peace with all the States of Italy, by restoring Sforza to Milan. So, though France and England had made the greatest Efforts, probably, it would have served only to hasten the Peace of Italy. But the King of France was not even sure of prevailing with Henry to act, who was still desirous to manage the Pope and Emperor, in hopes of obtaining their consent to his Divorce rather by fair means than by Arms. Besides, though he was bound to contribute large Sums for the War, he paid them only in Paper, by Acquittances of what was due to him from Francis. So, properly speaking, this was no assistance to France, drained by the former Wars of Men and Money. Francis had therefore no business to stand in suspense. It was necessary for him to make Peace at any rate. However, to obtain as good Terms as possible, he amused the Venetians, the Duke of Ferrara, and the Florentines, with great Promises, for fear they should prevent him, and after they had made their Peace with the Emperor, his condition become worse. He told them, he was resolved to lead in person a strong Army into Italy. He continued this management till he had concluded the Treaty of Cambray, wherein he left them all to the Emperor's Mercy. Probably, Henry was the only Ally that knew his Intentions. The Emperor was not ignorant of the situation of the French King's Affairs, and doubtless, would have made it turn more to his advantage, had not the Invasion, the Turks were preparing against Hungary and Austria, and the Commotions raised by the Protestants in Germany, made him desirous to leave Italy in quiet. Besides, he saw, that a Peace was the only way to break the strict Union of France with England. If these two Monarchs had joined in the League which the Protestants of Germany were projecting for their common defence, they would have created him troubles which might have broke all his measures. These were the motives that inclined the Emperor to Peace, which however he made France purchase very dear. Charles and Francis being in the same disposition, agreed together by secret Negotiations, upon the chief Articles of the Peace, the whole honour whereof they were pleased however to leave in appearance to the Ladies. In July, Margaret of Austria, the Emperor's Aunt, and Governors of the Low-Countries, and Louisa of Savoy, Duchess of Angoulême, Francis's Mother, repaired to Cambray (2), and signed the 5th of August, a Treaty, the Substance whereof was as follows:

That the Emperor should renounce his demand concerning Burgundy, his right to that Duchy remaining however entire.

That the King of France should pay him two millions of Crowns of Gold de sois, for the ransom of his Sons, and withdraw all his Forces out of Italy.

That he should resign to him the Sovereignty of Flanders and Artois.

That he should restore to him the Earldom of Artois, with whatever he held in the Duchy of Milan.

That he should renounce all his pretensions to the Kingdom of Naples.

That he should marry Queen Leonora, with whom the Emperor her Brother would give in Dower, two hundred thousand Crowns.

In short, besides several other private Articles, he promised to restore the Heirs of the late Duke of Bourbon to all that Prince's forfeited Estates.

This Treaty being ratified (3), it was some time before Francis durst give Audience to the Ambassadors of Venice and Florence, because he could not without confusion hear their just reproaches. At last, he put them off with some poor excuse and fresh promises, which he performed no better than those before the Peace. What was very ridiculous, even after the Peace was concluded, the Bishop of Tarbes his Ambassador at Venice, not having timely notice, strenuously solicited the Senate to support the War, upon the hopes he gave them of a powerful Aid.

It was something strange too, that, Henry having proclaimed War with the Emperor by a Herald, there should be however no particular Treaty between them. Henry was satisfied with an Article inserted in that of Cambray, whereby the King of France was bound to pay him the two hundred and ninety thousand Crowns, due from the Emperor, and redeem the rich Flower-de-luce, pawned by the Emperor Maximilian to Henry VII. for fifty thousand Crowns. He did more; for he generously forgave Francis the first Sum, and made a Present of the second to the Duke of Orleans, his God-son (4). This shows, that in making Peace, Francis I. had not dealt with Henry as with the Princes of Italy, but had convinced him of the necessity, he was under, to conclude it.

The Emperor being agreed with Francis upon the principal Articles of the Peace, departed from Barcelona before he received advice of the conclusion, and arrived the 12th of August at Genua with nine thousand Men. The Peace of Cambray being published shortly after, the Venetians, the Duke of Milan, the Duke of Ferrara, and the Florentines, whom the King of France had forsaken, saw no other refuge than the Emperor's Clemency, who had it in his power to make them pay dear for their Attachment to France. The discussion of their affairs being referred to a Conference, which the Emperor, was to have with the Pope at Bologna, each sent Ambassadors to take care of their concerns. Here it was that the Emperor enjoined the Venetians to restore to the Pope Ravenna and Cervia, and to himself some Places they still held in the Kingdom of Naples. Francesco Sforza was restored to the Duchy of Milan, on condition of paying to the Emperor four hundred thousand Crowns in hand, and five hundred thousand in the space of ten years, at ten payments. The Duke of Ferrara having offered to make the Emperor Arbitrer and Judge of his differences with the Pope, his offer was accepted, Clement VII. thinking nothing could be more for his advantage than to submit to the Emperor's decision, who was now bound by the Treaty of Barcelona to procure him Modena and Reggio, and assist him to take possession of Ferrara. As to the Florentines, it was not possible to reconcile them with the Pope. They would not hearken to any Agreement, unless they were assured of preserving their Liberty, being resolved to defend it to the last drop of their blood. They

But the Pope on his part, tendered them all sorts of advantages, provided the Family of the Medici were restored to Florence, upon the same foot as before the expulsion of the Legate. The Parties not agreeing, the Emperor ordered the Prince of Orange to besiege Florence, and restore the Medici.

The Emperor having ended his affairs in Italy, was impatient to return into Germany, where the affairs of Religion began to give him disturbance. For some time, the Protestants had insisted continually upon a free Council in Germany, which was positively promised though never intended. During the late War, the Emperor had all along amused them with the hopes of granting this Council. But no sooner was the Peace concluded, than in his Conference with the Pope at Bologna, he promised him to do his utmost to reduce them, without a Council. Mean while, the Protestants knowing his design, by his menacing answer to their Envoys, after the conclusion of the Peace, were thinking of joining in a league for their common defence; and this made the Emperor uneasy, and obliged him speedily to finish his affairs in Italy, in order to settle those of Germany. Before his departure from Bologna, he received the Imperial Crown at the Pope's hands the 24th of February 1530, on St. Matthias's day, which was his Birth-day, and which, on several occasions, had been very fortunate to him (1). He set out at length from Bologna, on the 22d of March 1530, for Germany, being attended by Cardinal Campeggio, who was to assist, from the Pope, at the diet of Augsburg.

The Prince of Orange invested Florence according to the Emperor's order, and was slain at the Siege, which the Florentines desperately maintained. At length, on the 10th of August, they were forced to capitulate, but however, on express condition that they should enjoy their liberty, leaving it to the Emperor to settle the form of their Government. But some days after, the Adherents of the Medici raising a tumult in the City, and finding themselves supported by a great number of Spanish Officers, who had entered on divers pretences, Clement VII was again put in possession of the Government. Then the Emperor, without regarding the Article of the Capitulation, established Alexander de Medici his Son-in-law at Florence, on the same foot that his Ancestors had formerly been, and made the Sovereignty hereditary in his Family.

The 1st of June this year, Francis received his two Sons, who were Hostages in Spain, upon paying the Emperor twelve hundred thousand Crowns in hand, and giving security for the rest of the sum. After that, he married Lenora, pursuant to the Treaty of Cambray. Had he been obliged to find ready-money to pay Henry what the Emperor owed him, according to the tenor of the Treaty, very probably he would not so soon have recovered his Sons. But Henry proved a generous Friend, who, to enable him to redeem them, freely gave him the Emperor's Bonds, to restore them to him, as well as the pawned Jewel above-mentioned (2). Moreover, he renounced all demands of his charges in assisting him, which, according to Francis's confession, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, amounted to the Sum of five hundred twelve thousand two hundred twenty-two Crowns of Gold Sol, two and twenty pence, six Farthings, both in ready-money and acquaintances upon the two Millions Francis owed him. He clogged this great Generosity but with one single condition, That in case Francis violated the Peace and Alliance they had made together, he should still be accountable for all these Sums, to which Francis bound himself by Letters-Patents.

By the execution of the Treaty of Cambray, the King of France saw himself at length in profound tranquillity, though the late War had cost him immense Sums, the loss of Genoa and Milan, the sovereignty of Flanders, the loss of Artis, a year's Captivity, numberless Vexations, and perhaps something of his Honour and Reputation. But it was not so with Henry. After a vast charge to support the interests of his Ally, he was still embarrassed with the affair of the Divorce, and in danger of a speedy quarrel with the Emperor. However, as he was naturally tender in his Projects, all those obstacles were not able to discourage him, and he resolved to see the end of the affair, let what would be the consequence. Thomas Cranmer being then very much in his esteem, he ordered him to write upon the Divorce; and the Doctor did it with universal approbation. After that, he was commanded to accompany the Ambassadors sent by the King to the Pope and Emperor, to try for the last time to find some expedient to end this affair, which so greatly embarrassed him. These Ambassadors found the Pope and Emperor at Bologna, and had audience of both. The Pope showed an inclination to content the King, but durst not act without the Emperor's consent, who openly protested, he would never forsake the Queen his Aunt. Cranmer maintained his master's Cause with great warmth, which hindered not the Pope from making him his Penitentiary in England, to please the King, whom he strove to oblige in things of little consequence, whilst he did nothing for him in the principal affair.

Mean while, Henry, pursuant to Cranmer's advice, had sent able and learned Men (3) into France, Italy, Germany, Switzerland, to consult the Universities concerning the Divorce. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the Opinions of the Universities of Angers, Paris, Bourges, Orleans, Thoulouse, Bologna, Ferrara, Padua, all uniform, declaring, that Julius II's dispensation for Henry's Marriage with Catherine being contrary to the divine Law, could not be deemed valid. It might be objected, that the determinations of the French Universities were suspicious, by reason of the strict union at that time between Francis and Henry. But the same thing cannot be said of those of Padua and Ferrara, and still less of that of Bologna, a City belonging to the Pope. Dr. Burnet, not having largely handled this Subject, those who have in mind to examine the matter more fully, may consult his History of the Reformation. It will suffice to observe here, that the question was, Whether Henry's Marriage with his Brother's Widow was contrary to the Law of God, and upon that supposition, whether the Pope had power to grant a Dispensation. The above named Universities maintained, That such a Marriage was contrary to the Law of God, with which the Pope had not power to dispense. Oxford and Cambridge being likewise consulted, decreed the same thing, though not without great opposition from some of the Members (4). It seems at first something strange, that the two English Universities should be more scrupulous in the matter than the foreign. But the surprise ceases, when it is considered that these scruples arose, not from the question itself, but from the consequence, their determination might occasion. Most of the Members of the Universities were furiously averse to Luther's Doctrine, which began to spread in England, and were afraid of countenancing it, by deciding against the Pope. Besides, they saw that the King's Marriage with Ann Bullen would follow upon his divorce with Catherine, and this second Marriage they would have gladly prevented, because Ann Bullen much inclined to the Reformation (5), and expressed a very particular esteem for Cranmer, whose preference, for the same reason, they dreaded.

The Ambassadors who had been sent into Italy (6), Henry's returning without effecting any thing, Henry, who till John Sleight in the Matter of the Divorce, then had shown great regard for the Pope, resolved to alter his behaviour towards him. He might have known by experience, that Clement was to be gained only by force. It is certain, if at first he had proceeded with more vigor, and powerfully supported the War in Italy, the Pope would never have thought of joining with the Emperor. A good English Fleet in the Mediterranean would have made Francis master of Naples, and have saved the City of Genoa. The Pope would thereby have been so kept in awe, that he would have been glad to have always the King of England for his Friend. Instead of acting in this manner, Henry remained quiet during the whole Campaign of 1528, suffering himself to be amused by the deceitful hopes given him by the Pope. So, the French were driven out of the Kingdom of Naples, and the Pope was at liberty to treat with the Emperor concerning the recovery of Florence, which he would never have thought of, had the French been superior in Italy. Henry perceived his error when it was too late to repair it, that is, after the Pope was united with the Emperor, and Francis bound by the Treaty of Cambray. He was left alone to support himself against the Emperor and Pope, and it was very happy for him that the Turks and the Protestants of Germany so embarrassed the Emperor, as to hinder him from thinking of England. So, all means failing to accomplish his design, but what could be found in his own Kingdom, he began, though a little too late, to make use of the inclinations of his Subjects, who for the most part were not very fond of the Pope.

We have seen in several places of this History, how at all times the English complained of the tyranny of the Popes, and the remedies applied by the Parliaments to this Grievance. It is true, the private interest of the Kings rendered these remedies in some measure ineffectual, because, as they frequently wanted the Popes for their temporal concerns, the Laws were not put in due execution. But that altered not the inclinations of the English. The Principles of the Lollards were still deeply imprinted in the minds of great numbers. Besides, Luther's Books, whereof many were brought into England, had opened the eyes of multitudes; so that it may be affirmed, at the time I am speaking of, the English in general had quite another notion of Religion than their Ancestors, especially with respect to the Papal authority. The three last Popes, Alexander VI, Julius II, and Leo X, had shown so little Piety and Religion in their conduct, and Clement VII so closely followed their steps, that it was naturally inferred, it was impossible, Jesus Christ should have given the Government of his Church to such Vicars. Thus the English were very ready to shake off the Pope's yoke, if the King, for the sake of his own private interest, had not supported the exorbitant Power so long complained of. But Clement VII had no sooner joined with the Emperor, than the King's interest became the same with the People's. To this chiefly are to be ascribed all the changes mentioned hereafter.

Henry having resolved to make the Pope sensible of the danger of losing England, if he continued any longer to favour the Emperor, caused a Letter, worded in strong Terms, to be sent him by the great Men of the Kingdom, according to the example of their Ancestors in the Reign of Henry III (1). They plainly told him, "That the King's Cause being their own, if he continued to deny them what was absolutely necessary for their quiet, they were resolved to apply the Remedy themselves, which was vainly expected from him." This was sufficient to satisfy him, that the patience of the English was almost worn out, and they would not suffer themselves to be curbed, or even amused any longer by the Court of Rome. Indeed, the Letter had not the desired effect, but however it showed the Pope the disposition of the English, and how necessary it was to use them gently. Wherefore he returned the great Men a very moderate answer, vindicating his conduct with respect to the King, in the best manner possible. Mean while, he sent for Sir Gregory Cassali, the King's Ambassador in ordinary, and hinted to him, that the affair might be adjusted by means of a Dispensation, for the King to have two Wives. This we learn from the Ambassador's letter of the 18th of September, where, after acquainting the King with what the Pope said, he added, that the Emperor's Ministers were also desirous that the Affair should be ended by this Expedient. But Henry was so aware of all the Pope's artifices, that he took no notice of this Overture. His resolution was, either to have a Bull to null the Marriage, or to procure himself, at any rate, the Satisfaction he required. And therefore, fearing that the Pope would unexpectedly send into England a Bull of Excommunication or Interdict, he issued out a Proclamation, forbidding under severe penalties, to receive any Bull from Rome, contrary to the Prerogatives of the Crown. His design was to bring the affair before the Parliament and Clergy, and after gaining these two Bodies to his Interest, to cause it to be determined in England, without regarding the Pope's Proceedings against him. The difficulty was, to prepeloss the People in his favour. To this end, he ordered to be printed and published an Abstract of the reasons for the divorce, that these reasons being known to all the World, he might meet with less opposition in the Parliament. This Abstract (2) contained two principal Points. The first was, That the King's Marriage with Catherine was contrary to the Law of God. The second, That Julius II had not power to grant a Dispensation for that Marriage, and consequently the Dispensation could not render it lawful. As this affair was the Spring of the great events which will hereafter occur, it will not be perhaps unacceptable to the Reader to see here the Substance of the arguments alleged on both Sides.

It was said for the King, I. That the Levitical Law forbidding a Man to marry his Brother's Wife, was not a positive precept, which bound only those to whom it was given, but obliged all Mankind without exception. That this evidently appeared, in its being found among many others, which forbid the crimes wherewith the Canaanites were polluted. Now the Canaanites could not be polluted with Crimes forbidden only by a positive Law given to another Nation.

II. Another Argument was taken from what John the Baptist said to Herod in the New Testament, It is not lawful for thee to take thy Brother's Wife, because St. John could allude only to the Laws of Moses, and consequently owned them to be divine.

III. It was shown from several Passages of Tertullian, and Writings of the Popes, that the Church always deemed the Levitical Laws as parts of the universal Law of Nature and all Mankind. To this was added the Authority of divers Provincial Synods, of the Constantinopolitan General Council, of the Council of Constance in the condemnation of Wickliffe, of many Greek and Latin Fathers, and of several Schoolmen.

IV. It was proved by the Authority of the Popes and Councils, that a Marriage is completed by the mutual Contract of the Parties, though it be never consummated. For that reason it was said, Adamiah could not marry Abishag, who had been his Father David's Wife, tho' David never knew her. That upon the same account, Joseph could not put away Mary, without a Bill of Divorce; a clear evidence that their Marriage was complete, though not consummated. Hence it was inferred, that though Prince Arthur had not consummated his Marriage, it was not the less valid. But it was maintained, that it was as certain as a thing of that nature could be, that the Marriage was consummated. It was proved first by violent Presumptions. Secondly, because after Arthur's death, the Princess his Widow was supposed to be with Child, and she never said any thing to the contrary. It is true, it might be objected that Catherine had since sworn, she was never known by that Prince. But it was replied, the Canon Law forbids the taking of Oaths, when there are strong Presumptions to the contrary. Besides, the Queen's Oath could not be reckoned decisive, since it was destroyed by the Brief produced by her own Advocates.

V. Julius's dispensation being the sole foundation on which the validity of the King's Marriage was established, it was shown by a crowd of Witnesses, both ancient and modern, that the Pope has not power to dispense with the Laws of God. Nay, it was affirmed, That if he dispensed with the Decrees of the Church, it was Usurpation, and that several Bishops in England itself, had resisted the Popes when they would have assumed such a liberty.

On the other side, the Queen's Advocates replied to these reasons:

I. That the Prohibitions in Leviticus were not parts of the moral Law, since God himself had dispensed with them, in commanding the Brother to marry his Brother's Widow. But of what nature soever the Law was, if it were dispensed with by Moses to the Jews, why might it not be as well done by the Pope to the Christians?

II. It was said, the Law in Leviticus against marrying the Brother's Wife, must be understood of not taking her while the Brother was alive; for after he was dead, by another Law, a Man was commanded by God himself to marry his Brother's Wife.

III. The Crime St. John Baptist reproached Herod with, might be Adultery as well as Incest, since according to Josephus and Eusebius, Herod's Brother Philip was alive when St. John spoke.

(1) Lord Herbert says, it was done by the Parliament; but that's a mistake, the Letter being dated the 13th of July, it appears by the Records there could be no Session at that time, the Houses being prorogued from the 21st of June, to the 1st of October. The Letter it seems was sent about to the chief Members for their Hands, and Cromwell tells us with what cheerfulness Cardinal Wolsey signed it. It was subscribed by the two Archbishops, four Bishops, two Dukes, two Marquisses, thirteen Earls, two Viscounts, twenty three Barons, twenty two Abbots, eleven Commons, most of them the King's Servants. Herbert, p. 142.

(2) Learned Men were appointed to compare all that had been written on the Subject, and out of all the Transcripts of the Manuscripts, of Fathers and Councils, to collect whatsoever did strengthen it. Three of these Manuscripts are in the Cotton Library. All these and many more were summed up in a short Book, and printed first in Latin, then in English, with the Determinations of the Universities before it. See Burnet, Vol. I. p. 97.

1530. Council, he should take care what he put in his head, for he would never be able to put it out again. This seems to intimate, he had counselled the King to undertake the Divorce, which afterwards he would have disfluted him from. And indeed, he desired the same Person to tell the King, that he prayed him to call to remembrance what had passed betwixt them about the Divorce, and hoped, that when he should be less prejudiced, he would do him more justice. This shews that he looked upon that affair as the sole Cause of his disgrace. Thus died this famous Cardinal, the proudest and most haughty of Men, and we may add, the most ambitious and most greedy of estates and honours. It is affirmed, that while he governed the King, he never gave him advice without a view to his own interest. This alone would be sufficient to obscure all the fine qualities he might otherwise have, but which, in the main, amounted only to a great Penetration, whereof he made an ill use. The King shewed a concern for his death (1). And yet, since he had ordered him to be arrested for High-Treason, very probably, his ruin was determined. Henry was of a temper to accomplish whatever he undertook (2). This will plainly appear hereafter, in his extraordinary severity to Persons, who doubtless were not so guilty as this Favorite.

The affair of the Divorce (3), and its consequences, employing Henry during the residue of his life, it will for the future be the principal thing I shall have to speak of, to the end of this Reign. But as by the alterations introduced by this Prince into his Kingdom, his affairs led him to concern himself with the troubles of Germany, it is necessary, for the understanding of the sequel, just to mention what passed in that Country.

Germany as to Religion.
Stradan.

The Emperor's aim in calling the diet of Augsburg, was rather to inflame than appease the religious troubles. Since he made peace with France, and Italy was as it were subject to his yoke, he was forming vast projects. He saw himself master of Spain, Italy, and the Low-Countries; his Brother Ferdinand was now King of Bohemia, and had been elected King of Hungary. With these advantages, he hoped to be able to subdue the rest of Europe. It was necessary to begin with Germany, where he had great power, as Emperor and Archduke of Austria, because if he once became absolute in the Empire, and could dispose of the forces of the German Princes, he imagined France and England would not be able to resist him. The troubles caused by Religion in Germany, seemed to him a very specious pretence to arm against the Protestants, judging, that after ruining them by the help of the Catholics, these last would, in their turn, be easily subdued. I cannot be accused here of ascribing to this Monarch designs he never really had, since it is notorious that himself and Successors pursued gradually, and, I may say, openly, the execution of the same Project. The Wars that afflicted Europe for more than a Century, were solely excited by the boundless ambition of the House of Austria, whom the other Sovereigns were concerned to oppose.

Progress of the Reformation.
Stradan.

Since Luther's preaching in Germany, the Reformation had made great progress, that several Princes of the Empire, and many Hans Towns had openly embraced it. As they were accused of introducing many Innovations in Religion, in answer to that Charge, they protested, their Intent was only to adhere to the Doctrine of the Gospel, and Religion of the primitive Church. And therefore, they demanded that a free Council might be held in some City of Germany, where the religious differences might be calmly examined by the Word of God. But this was a method which their Adversaries could not allow. They supposed, as a thing certain, that the Religion professed before Luther's appearance, was the true Religion, and being without spot, wrinkle or the like, had no need of reformation. According to that principle, they thought the point was not to examine it at all, but to compel the Recusants or Heretics to conform. This was the constant Maxim, long since followed by the Romish Clergy, and which caused them to use fire and sword to extirpate those they were pleased to term Heretics. But in the situation of Germany, at the time I am speaking of, it was not easy to practise that Maxim. It was not private persons only who declared against the Roman Church, but Cities, whole Nations, and Sovereigns. So the zealous Abettors of the old Religion were not in condition to reduce them by force. Wherefore they chose to feed them with hopes of a free Council, till the Affairs of Europe were so disposed, that it might be hoped to reduce them by way of Authority. Several Diets had been held upon that subject in Germany, where, contrary to the opinion of the Court of Rome, the Emperor and the Catholic Princes had been obliged to conceal their Sentiments, and consent to a Toleration, which however left them at liberty to act another time according to their real Principles.

When Luther began to appear, the religious Disputes turned only upon the excessive abuses of the Papal Power, and a few other points. Then Luther had on his side almost all the Lay-Princes of Germany, and many Hans Towns, each of which was a Republic. From that time, he made new discoveries, and published them to the world. But he had not upon all the Articles the same number of Followers, as upon that of the Papal Authority. Besides, the Emperor and the zealous Catholics opposed with all their power the progress of the Reformation. Care was taken to intimidate such as inclined that way, or to continue them in the old Religion by Promises, by Places, by Poffs, which did not a little help to confirm them in their first Sentiments. So for some years, the Reformers used all possible endeavours to gain Profelytes, and the Romish Clergy were as diligent to hinder their progress. Mean time, whilst they strove only in this manner, the Reformation daily took root; which obliged the Adversaries to seek other means to prevent its growth, those, hitherto used, not proving very effectual.

In 1524 Charles V, coming to the Diet of Worms, sent for Luther, and after a hearing, banished him the Empire with all his Adherents, by a formal Decree in the Diet's name. But some pretend, the Diet was not concerned in the Decree. However, the Emperor persisted to maintain it. But it seems the Germans considered it not as obligatory. Next year, the Diet, held at Nuremberg, produced against the Court of Rome, a hundred Grievances, of which they demanded the redress, by means of a free Council.

Another Diet held at the same place, passed a Decree, whereby it was resolved to demand a free Council in Germany. But upon their dissolution, the Catholics assembled by themselves at Ratisbon, and ordered the Decree of Worms to be executed.

In another Diet at Spire in 1526, the Emperor caused it to be declared, that he meant not that any resolution should be taken concerning the affairs of Religion, but only concerning the method of executing the Decree of Worms, till there should be a General Council. But as this Council was yet very remote, the Diet decreed, the Emperor should be prayed to procure a Council in Germany within a year, and in the mean while, every one should so govern himself in point of Religion, as to be able to give an account of his Conduct to God and the Emperor.

During these Transactions, the War which the Turks had carried into Hungary, suspended for some time the execution of Charles V's Projects against those who had embraced the new Religion, because he wanted the assistance of all the German Princes, as well Protestants as Catholics (4). Besides, his War then with France suffered him not to think much of the affairs of Germany. But in 1529, being upon the point of making Peace with France, he thought he might talk in a higher strain. He called a Diet at Spire, where it was ordered, that those who had hitherto obeyed the Decree of Worms, should continue to observe it, and the rest that had not submitted, should make no Innovations in Religion, nor hinder their Subjects from going to Mass. Against this Decree the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Princes of Lunenburg, made a solemn Protestation, from whence all their Party were called Protestants. The Emperor, who was then in Italy, very roughly received the Protestation, brought to him by Deputies, and thereby obliged the Protestants to unite for their common defence, the Emperor discovering by his words, that he had ill designs against them. In the Diet which was to meet at Augsburg in April 1530, but did not however assemble till June, he was resolved to lay the Foundation of his projected War against the Protestants.

At the opening of the Diet, the Emperor's Chancellor made a long Speech, complaining, in his Master's name, of those who had hitherto endeavoured to alter the ancient Faith, and Cardinal Campgio exhorted the Germans to extirpate the Errors that were crept into Germany. That done, the Protestants desired, they might declare their belief before the Diet. This was denied them, and they were made to take as a favour, the leave granted them to deliver their Confession of Faith in writing. The Landgrave of Hesse seeing so great partiality in the Diet, withdrew without taking leave, whereupon the Emperor commanded the Gates of Augsburg to be shut, shewing he intended no violence towards those that remained in the City. But upon the Elector of Saxony's Remonstrances, he ordered them to be opened. In short, after many Debates (1), he caused to be published in the Diet's name, a Decree entirely against the Protestants, and which upon the hopes he gave them of a General Council, obliged them to destroy whatever had been done in Point of Religion to that day.

The Diet ending in this manner, the Emperor ordered the Archbishop of Mentz to assemble the Electors, to proceed to the Election of a King of the Romans, intending to cause his Brother Ferdinand to be chosen. The Protestants strenuously opposed this meeting, affirming, there was no occasion to elect a King of the Romans, and demonstrating the Inconveniencies which would arise from his design to render the Imperial Crown as it were Hereditary to the House of Austria. In fine, seeing that, notwithstanding their Remonstrances, it was designed to proceed to this Election, they met at Smalkald the 22d of December 1530, and concluded a defensive League against all who should attack them on account of Religion. Then they made a formal Protestation against the intended Election of a King of the Romans without their consent. In this situation were the affairs of Religion in Germany about the end of the year 1530.

After the Emperor had quitted Italy, the Pope's Nuncio continually pressed him to pronounce judgment upon the affair of the Duke of Ferrara. The Pope could not imagine but the Judgment would be in his favour, considering the Emperor's Engagement with him, by the Treaty of Barcelona. But whether the Emperor had more fully examined the matter, or for some other reason, he gave Sentence, that Modena and Reggio belonged of right to the Duke of Ferrara; but to satisfy the Pope, he should pay a hundred thousand Ducats, for which the Pope should be obliged to give him the Investiture of Ferrara, as granted to his Predecessors; and to begin to execute this Sentence, he delivered Modena to the Duke. The Pope, extremely displeased with a Judgment so different from what he expected, refused to submit to it, and in hopes of seizing Ferrara, would not receive the hundred thousand Ducats offered him by the Duke.

the Pope.

Clement VII being thus incited against the Emperor, had great Inclination to be reconciled with the Kings of France and England, imagining his should be received with open Arms. Indeed, Francis I had willingly agreed to the Treaty of Cambrey, and folely because there was no other way to recover his Sons. But since he had received them, he had been thinking how to retrieve what he had lost by that Treaty. To this end, he privately laboured to sow Jealousies among the Princes, by making them apprehensive of the Emperor's Ambition, and promising them assistance. As soon as he was informed of the Pope's discontent, he thought, nothing should be neglected to gain him to his Interest at so favorable a Juncture. Wherefore he proposed a Marriage between Catherine de Medici Daughter of the late Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Orleans his second Son, an Honour to which the Family of the Medici durst never aspire, if the King had not offered it himself. On the other hand, Henry knowing the Union between the Pope and the Emperor was the sole cause of the obstacles in the affair of the Divorce, did not question, he should easily effect his designs, if he could set them at variance. But two things hindered him from applying himself to that means. The first was, he could not trust the Pope. The second, that he began to find his Subjects much more inclined to shake off the Papal Yoke, than he had imagined, and therefore did not think himself under a necessity to depend upon the Pope. If he had at first humbly addressed to the Pope, it was partly because he feared the People's prejudice in favour of Christ's Vicar. But when he found this prejudice was not so strong as he had believed, he never troubled himself about the Pope's opposition. His Kingdom being safe from Invasions by Land, he had nothing to fear from any Prince in Europe, provided his Subjects were not terrified with the thunders of the Papian. But the English were not in this respect the same as formerly. Wickliff had begun to enlighten them; the Conduct of the late Popes had increased their light; and Luther's Books and Followers had quite opened their Eyes. Since the spreading of the new Doctrine in England, the Pope's Authority was so discredited, that the English for the most part wished for a favorable opportunity to throw off a Yoke they had so long groaned under. This made the King resolve to have his Cause tried by the Parliament and Convocation.

The Parliament meeting the 6th of January, the Chancellor opened the Session with a Speech, declaring that the King earnestly wished to annul his Marriage, not from difhonest motives, as some laboured to make the people believe, but for the peace of his Conscience, and the welfare of the Kingdom, being unwilling to leave the Succession of the Crown in danger of being disputed. Then A. P. B. he cauled a great number of Books and Treatises written on that Subject, with Abstracts of several Authors both antient and modern, to be brought, with the Determinations of the Universities of France, Italy, and England, which were all left upon the Table to be examined at leisure (2). The King's design was also brought before the Convocation, who declared, they were fatished the King's Marriage was contrary to the Law of God. The King required no more at this time. He had another important affair to debate with the Clergy, which was to be decided before this was further examined. Very likely, the Convocation being informed of the King's Intent, the more readily gave their opinion for him, as they perfectly knew how much they should want his favour in the business in hand, which was of the utmost consequence, Cardinal Wolsey had been accused by the Attorney General, of exercising in England his Legatine Authority without the King's special Licence, and of disposing of Legate from several Benefices, contrary to the Statutes of Provisors and Premunire. Hence it naturally followed, that those who had owned his Authority, and appeared in his Courts, were equally liable to be indicted. By this means, all the Clergy were in the same case, since there was scarce one but what had occasion to apply to him during the course of his Legateship.

So, after the King had procured of the Convocation an Approbation of his proceedings concerning the Divorce, he ordered an Indictment to be brought into the King's Bench against all the Clergy, for breaking the Laws of the Realm (3). He had in this a double view; the first to draw a good Sum from the Clergy; the second, to humble that powerful Body, and to lessen their great Credit with the People, who before had always seen them supported by the Royal Authority. He knew he should meet with the greatest opposition from the Clergy in the affair of the Divorce. For that reason, he was very glad to put it out of their power to hurt him, by keeping them as it were in dependence, and by sowing a kind of division between the Clergy and People, by the satisfaction these last would probably express at the disgrace of the Ecclesiastics, who had ever treated them with great haughtiness. He thereby put the Clergy under a necessity of recurring to the Royal Protection, and consequently of shewing less Zeal for the Interest of the Court of Rome. This succeeded according to his expectation. In vain did the Clergy plead, that the King himself had connived at the Cardinal's proceedings. What had not been servicable to Wolsey, was not capable of excusing them that had owned his Authority. So the Court proceeded to a Sentence, that the Clergy were all out of the King's Protection, and liable to the pains in the Statute of Premunire. The People were extremely pleased, and particularly the Favourers of the new Religion, to see the Clergy humbled to so great a degree. On the other hand, the Clergy plainly perceived, that as the Laity stood affected, it would be in vain to resist the King. They could expect no more assistance from Rome. Since the Pope had quarrelled with the King, he had lost all his power; and as the King shewed he would no longer regard him, the thunders of the Vatican were looked upon with contempt. The Clergy, in this their ill situation, resolved to purchase the King's favour at any rate, finding they could no longer depend upon the people, who were much altered from what they were formerly. So the Convocation of Canterbury having debated upon the Affair, resolved (4) to offer the King a hundred thousand Pounds for a pardon. Pursuant to this resolution, some of their Members were ordered to draw an Act accordingly, for that purpose. Probably, they who were charged with this Commission were Friends of the Court, and had a great mind to take this opportunity to give the King a Progre-1531. tive which none of his Predecessors had ever enjoyed. Lord Herbert and Doctor Burnet say, the Convocation resolved to present a Petition to the King, to pray him to accept of a hundred thousand Pounds. But as this Instrument is extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, it may now be spoken of with greater exactness. It was not a Petition, but a publick Act of the Clergy, in form of Letters Patents, whereby they gave that Sum to the King. It was laid in the Instrument, that it was, First, in consideration of his great Merit. Secondly, in testimony of the Clergy's Gratitude for the great benefits he had procured the Catholick Church, as well by his Pen as his Sword. Thirdly, for his Zeal against the Lutherans, who were labouring to destroy the Church of England, of which the Clergy acknowledged the King sole Protector, and supreme Head (1). Lastly, in hopes he would be pleased to grant the Clergy and all their Members, a pardon of all the offences committed against the Statutes of Provisors and Praemunire.

When this Instrument was read in the Convocation, many disliked that the Clergy should be made to say, that they acknowledged the King for Protector and supreme Head of the Church of England. Some imagined, it was inserted through inadvertency and excessive flattery, whereof the Penmen of the Instrument had not considered the consequence. Others said, it was intended to surprize the Convocation, by inferring these words in the body of an Instrument, which was only to grant a sum to the King. They added, these same words, which seemed to be put in by accident, and without design, were however of very great consequence, and as the Convocation had not taken any resolution upon that point, they were for raising them out. But on the other hand, those who were in the Secret, pretended the words could not be put out by a formal resolve, without displeasing the King, and giving him occasion to refuse the offered compensation. This caused such debates, that they were forced to put off the decision of the affair to the next day. It was not without reason that several dreaded the consequence which might very naturally be drawn from these words, since it was evident, the Clergy was thereby engaged to acknowledge the Pope no longer head of the Church of England, which could not have two supreme Heads at once.

This was in effect the King's Intention, as well as their's who had penned or drawn the Instrument, as plainly appeared the next day. Thomas Cromwell, with others of the King's Council, going to the Convocation, very clearly hinted, that the Point in debate yesterday was very agreeable to the King, and he could not but consider the Opposers as very disaffected Persons. After such a declaration, there was not one that durst directly oppose it, especially as the Archbishop and several other Prelates openly maintained, that the King was truly the supreme Head of the Church of England. So the Act passed as it was drawn. Only some moved to add this restriction, as far as is consistent with the Law of Christ. But it was not the King's Intention to leave a door for those to escape, who should hereafter dispute his Supremacy (2). The Instrument being sealed the 22d of March, was presented to the King, who very graciously accepted both the Clergy's present, and his new Title, of which he afterwards made great use. The Convocation of the Province of York resolved likewise to give the King eighteen thousand eight hundred and forty Pounds. But as they omitted in the Grant to acknowledge the King supreme Head of the Church of England, they were told, that their Present would not be accepted, if they spoke not like the Convocation of Canterbury.

So the Clergy of York Province were forced to infer the same acknowledgment in their Instrument. In this manner the King procured, or rather extorted from the Clergy, the Title of supreme Head of the Church of England. It is certain, that though some freely gave it him, yet the major part were not of that opinion (3). This is evident from the methods used to obtain it. This acknowledgment was procured in the manner we have seen, by William Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cromwell, and some others, who verily believed there was no occasion for the Pope. Those who flattered themselves at first, that the words were inserted without design in the Instrument brought into the Convocation of Canterbury, might have seen their error, if they had attended to another Article in the same Instrument, and which was also inserted in that of the Province of York, namely, that the Clergy did promise for the future neither to make nor execute any Constitution without the King's Licence. This was, in other words, acknowledging the King for supreme Head of the Church of England. We shall see hereafter what use Henry made of this new Title.

The King being satisfied with the Clergy, granted them a Pardon in ample form. But when the Pardon was brought into the House of Commons, they refused to pass it, unless the Laity, who might have been guilty of the same offences, were also included (4). Henry offended at their opposition, sent them word, he would be master of his own favours, and not suffer them to be forced from him. The King's resolution terrified the Commons, who to avoid his Indignation, passed the Pardon as it was, throwing themselves upon his Mercy as to what concerned the Laity. Then the King, satisfied with their Submission, granted to his Temporal Subjects a Pardon like that to his Spiritual. It seems however, that the Colleges and Monasteries were excepted, who not being included in the Pardons, were forced to compound with the King, as we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

So far were the people from rising, (as they would doubtless have done, had they been under the same prejudice with their Ancestors in the Reigns of Henry II. and King John;) that on the contrary, Joy was visibly painted on their Faces, being highly delighted to see the Clergy humbled. Thus that Body, so formidable heretofore, instead of daring to resist the King, were constrained to fly to his Protection, because they saw plainly, the people shewed no concern at their disgrace, and they had no remedy elsewhere (5).

When the Pope heard what had passed in England, he was terribly embarrassed. He saw Henry pursuing such measures as would probably be attended with ill Consequences. However, he durst not venture to proceed haughtily, for fear of engaging in a quarrel, which he forelaw would not be to his advantage. Besides his not being pleased with the Emperor, he saw him upon the point of being fully employed by the Turks, and the German Protestants, at a time when France and England were in strict Union. So, perceiving no assistance speedy enough, in case he should attempt to exert his Authority, he chose to be silent, in expectation of a proper Season to act, or at least to be reconciled to the King.

This Affair being ended, Henry prorogued the Parliament (6). Then, he ordered the determinations of the Universities to be printed, with the opinions of the Learned concerning his Marriage, that against the next Session every one might be informed of the state of the case and of his motives to prosecute the Divorce. Mean while, as in putting away the Queen, his Intent was to marry Ann Bullen, he passionately wished, the Queen would be persuaded to consent to the Divorce, in order to avoid the inconveniences which might arise from her obstinacy. To that purpose, he sent some Bishops and Lay-Lords (7), earnestly to press her, either to consent to the Divorce, or refer the decision of the affair to four Prelates and four Seculars. But as the could not be prevailed with to desist from her Appeal to the Pope (8), he sent her word to chuse where she would reside in any of his Manors, and

The Poison was apprehended, and by Act of Parliament (as Hen. VIII.) poisoning was declared Treason, and Rouse was straitened and sentenced to be boiled to death, which was to be the punishment of poisoning for all times to come; (but was repealed 1 Ed. 1531. the 14th of July 1531, took his leave of her [at Windſor] intending never to ſee her more (1).

What had lately paſſed in the Parliament and Convocation, encouraged the Well-wiſhers to a Reformation in the Church, to which they already law ſome preparatives. For this reaſon, religious Diſputes became more frequent and publick than formerly. But the King perceiving what interferences would be drawn from his firſt proceedings, was pleaſed to ſhew, that in throwing off the Popal yoke, he deſigned not to ſtrike at the fundamental Truths of Religion. So, to fruſtrate thoſe who had any ſuch thought, he commanded the Laws againſt Hereticks to be rigorouſly executed. This occaſioned the death of three Proteſtants, namely, Bilney, Bayfield, and Baynam, of whom the two firſt were burnt this year, and the other in the following April (2).

Whilst theſe things were tranſacting in England, the affairs of Germany were more embroiled. In the beginning of the year, Ferdinand of Auſtria King of Babia and Hungary, was elected King of the Roman, notwithstanding the Proteſtation of the Confederates of Smalcald, and crowned a few days after at Aix la Chapelle. This was in conſequence of a League concluded between the Catholic Princes of Germany in the foregoing November. But this League was offenſive, whereas that of Smalcald was only deſenſive. Never had the Proteſtants any deſign to force the Conſciences of ſuch as differed from them in opinion. But the intent of the Catholic League, was to compel the Proteſtants to return to the Church, they had forſaken. Theſe laſt proteſted againſt Ferdinand's election as unneceſſary, and contrary to the uſual Forms. But their Proteſtation had no effect.

The reſt of the year was ſpent in ſundry Negotiations, wherein the Emperor ſeemed to have no other aim than to adjust the religious Differences, though in effect his deſign was only to amuſe the Proteſtants, and hinder them from taking meaſures for their defence, when they ſhould be attacked. As they were not ignorant of his artifice, they writ on that ſubject to the Kings of France and England, who returned them favorable Anſwers, with a promiſe of aſſiſtance in caſe it was attempted to oppreſs them. Not that theſe two Monarchs deſired to countenance the Reformation, but it was their Intereſt to protect the German Proteſtants, becauſe their deſtruction could not but exceedingly increaſe the Emperor's Power. Indeed, this was one of the chief means whereby that Prince intended to execute his laſt deſigns.

1532. Whilst the Emperor was forming Projects to become maſter of Germany, under colour of ſupporting the Intereſts of Religion and the Empire, Francis I turned to all ſides to try to create him troubles capable of producing ſome change which he might improve. His vexation to have been forced to ſign the Treaty of Cambray, threw him upon earneſtly ſeeking means to repair his loſſes, and eſpecially to recover Genoa and Milan. To this end, he careleſſly or threatened the Pope, according as he ſaw it proper to uſe one or other of theſe means, and put the Proteſtants of Germany in hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance, in caſe they were attack'd by the Emperor (3). But chiefly he laboured to ſecure the King of England, becauſe he could be moſt ſerviceable to him. He confirmed him, as much as poſſible, in his reſolution to puſh the affair of the divorce, in order to keep him always at variance with the Emperor and the Pope. Sometimes he intimated to him, that if the Juſtice due to him was obſtinately reſuſed, he would join in a League with him, to withdraw their Dominions from the tyrannical power of the Court of Rome. Then, fearing he would agree with the Emperor, he adviſed him ſpeedily to marry Ann Bullen, well knowing it would be a certain means to widen their Breach. Nay he ſent a Letter to the Pope, wherein he appeared no leſs concerned than Henry himſelf in the affair of the divorce. Among other things he told him, that if out of Complaiſance or Fear he continued to be governed by the Emperor, he muſt not think it ſtrange, that the King of England ſhould endeavour to procure by extraordinary means the juſt ſatisfaction he had ſo long expected in vain; adding, that his intereſts were ſo ſtrictly united with Henry's, that he was indifferently obliged to aſſiſt to the utmoſt of his power, a Prince of whom he gloried to be the perpetual Ally. In ſhort, he prayed him to conſider, whether it was prudent to give thoſe who could not be compelled to obey, the opportunity and will to withdraw their obedience. But Clément Henry only the Emperor's Forces in Italy, took care not to follow ſuch dangerous counſels.

The two Kings finding at length it was impoſſible to win the Pope, reſolved upon an Interview, to contrive means to break the Emperor's meaſures. But they thought proper firſt to ſpread a report, they were going to make a new League, in order to frighten the Pope, and hinder him from cloſing again with the Emperor, from whom he was ſomething alienated by the buſineſs of Ferrara. Accordingly, they concluded a League at London, ſigned the 23d of June. But it is manifeſt this Treaty was made only with the fore-mentioned view, ſince it contained but two Articles that could have reaſonably alarmed the Pope or the Emperor, had they been known to them.

The firſt was, That in caſe the Emperor ſeized the Engliſh Merchants effects in the Low-Countries, the King of France would do the ſame with reſpect to the Emperor's Subjects, the Germans excepted: Nay, this Article was guarded by ſo many reſtrictions on the part of the French King, that it plainly appeared to be only a mere pretence to make a Treaty. By the ſecond, if the King of England was attacked by the Emperor, Francis was to ſend him an aid of five hundred Lances, and if the King of France was invaded, Henry was to aſſiſt him with a body of Foot, not exceeding five thouſand Men (4). As the Publick was not acquainted with the particulars of the Treaty, ſeveral reports were ſpread. Some ſaid, the two Kings had agreed to join in the League of Smalcald, or at leaſt, to ſend a powerful aid to the German Proteſtants. Others fancied, that as the Turks threatened Auſtria, and the Emperor would be unavoidably obliged to lead his forces into that Country, Francis would invade at the ſame time the Duchy of Milan, and Henry carry War into the Low-Countries. All theſe reports, though uncertain, made the Emperor very uneaſy, becauſe they were grounded upon very probable conjectures.

The Interview of the two Kings, between Calais and Boulogne, was not till October (5). They had principally two things in view. The firſt, to divert the blame thrown on them by the Emperor, in ſpreading over all Europe, that whilſt Chriſtendom was going to be invaded by the Infidels, they remained idle Spectators of the danger, without offering the leaſt aſſiſtance to thoſe who were preparing to defend Her. Their other view was, to keep the Italians and Germans in the expectation of a freſh War, for fear they ſhould become too compliant to the Emperor's will. To effect their deſign, they gave one another Letters-Patents, whereby they engaged jointly to raiſe an Army of eighty thouſand Men, to ſtop the progreſs of the Turks, and to lead the ſame either into Germany or Italy, as there ſhould be occaſion. But this pretended agreement was never put into the form of a Treaty. Du Tillet ſpeaks of it in his Inventory of the Treaties between France and England, by the name of Letters of agreement: But there are no ſigns of it in the Collection of the Publick Acts of England. Wherefore it is not probable, theſe two Monarchs deſired to execute this pretended Project, the ſole aim whereof was to juſtify them to the World, and inſpire the Emperor and Pope with terror. Doubtleſs that was the reaſon of their affecting to publiſh it.

During the Interview, Henry complained much of the Pope, and Francis even improved upon him, in a long enumeration of the complaints he had received from the Gallican Church, on account of the Court of Rome's exactions. But this was only to amuſe Henry, ſince he was at that very time in ſecret Negotiation with the Pope, concerning the Duke of Orleans his ſecond Son's Marriage with Catherine de Medici. It manifeſtly appears by that Prince's whole conduct, that his ſole aim was to make the King of England's Friendſhip ſubſervient to gain the Pope, in order to recover Genoa and Milan, which he had always in view. Wherefore he outwardly expreſſed a ſtrong attachment to Henry's Intereſt. He even preſſed him not to ſtay for the Pope's diſpenſation to marry his Miſtreſs, who was preſent at the Interview, having lately been made Marchionneſs of Pembroke (6). Whilſt the two Kings were together, they feaſted one another ſeveral times, a particular account whereof is needleſs in this place. Henry came to ſee Francis at Boulogne, and Francis returned his viſit at

But by reason of the bad weather, Henry staid some days at Calais (2), where it is said he privately married Ann Bullen (3). It is more probable however, as some affirm, that it was not till the January following (4).

The Turks were now in Hungary. During this whole year, the Emperor was greatly embarrassed. Saliman Emperor of the Turks threatened to invade Hungary with a powerful Army, which he accordingly did. Germany was in trouble, because the Protestants who had now been menaced, were taking effectual measures for their defence, and refused to acknowledge Ferdinand of Austria for King of the Romans. On the other hand, the Emperor was not ignorant of the Pope's discontent on account of the Duke of Ferrara's affairs, and that the Kings of France and England were using their utmost endeavours to draw him off from his Party, in order to disturb Italy. Moreover, the Italians were quiet, only because there was still an Imperial Army in Italy, and no preparation in France to support them, in case they attempted to hold up their head. Mean while, in the midst of this seeming tranquillity, they eagerly wished to see some revolution to free them from their apprehensions of the Emperor's over-grown Power. In fine, the Interview of Francis and Henry extremely troubled the Emperor, apprehensive as he was, that if Saliman prospered in Hungary, they would embrace that opportunity to invade the Duchy of Milan and the Low-Countries. It was necessary therefore to think, without loss of time, of preventing the dangers which might proceed from all these quarters, and to begin with the most urgent affair, the satisfying of the Protestants, in order to have their assistance against the Turks. To that purpose, he came, the beginning of the year, to the Diet of Ratisbon, where he found means to negotiate with the Protestants an agreement, whereby no Person was to be disturbed on account of Religion, till a Council was called. He intended not punctually to perform this agreement, extorted from him by necessity. He received however this benefit by it, That all the Princes and States of Germany, as well Protestant as Catholic, furnished him with a powerful aid, which enabled him to assemble an Army of eighty thousand Foot, and thirty thousand Horse.

He did at Ratisbon great things in favour of the Protestants.

Charles obtained aid.

He satisfied the King of France.

He complied with the Turks.

He pushed into Spain.

He conferred with the Pope at Bologna.

He demanded a Council.

While this Army was forming, the Emperor, willing to found the King of France's Intentions, sent and desired his assistance against the Turks; but received an unsatisfactory answer, which, added to the Interview of the two Kings, confirmed his suspicion that they were contriving something against him. But Saliman hastening his Campaign in Hungary, hindered him from thinking of means to prevent the mischief he feared from the two confederate Kings. Indeed, the Turks not only advanced into Hungary, but even into Austria, with design to give him battle. But he wisely avoided it, since in losing it, he would have been without refuge, and Austria, with part of Germany, would inevitably have fallen under the Dominion of the Turks. Whereas by standing, as he did, upon the defensive, with an Army of above a hundred thousand Men, he prevented them from making any considerable progress, and compelled them at length to return into their own Country. As soon as he had certain advice that Saliman was upon his march to Constantinople, he departed for Italy, from whence he designed to return into Spain.

About the middle of November he came to Bologna, where the Pope waited to confer with him. As their designs were very opposite, there was not that harmony between them, as at their Interview in the year 1529. The Emperor thought only of securing Italy, and preventing the King of France's return. The Pope, on the contrary, wished to keep him always uneasy on that account, as well to render himself necessary, as to be freed from a State of dependence. The Emperor required the Pope to call a Council in Germany, otherwise he saw no possibility of finding a lawful pretence to ruin the Protestants. But after what had passed at Constance and Basil, the very name of a Council was become so odious to the Court of Rome, that Clement VII could not resolve to call one. He knew what had befallen John XXII, and Eugenius IV, and therefore had no mind to have his Authority questioned. The Emperor demanded moreover the Pope's consent to a League, he intended to form between all the States of Italy, to which each should contribute in proportion to its Forces, in order to secure the Country from all Invasion. That is to say, he would have in Italy an Army maintained at the expence of others, and always ready to defend the Duchy of Milan, in case the French King should think of invading it. The Pope approved of this project, not in order to keep Italy in its present situation, since it was very much to his prejudice, that the Emperor should remain so powerful there, but to have a pretence to be rid of the German and Spanish Troops, who were a terror to the Italians. He foresaw that a League of so many Parties, whose interests were different, would not long subsist, and that after it was broken, he should himself become more necessary and considerable. He desired only that the Venetians should come into the League, and bear their part of the charge. In short, the Emperor farther demanded of the Pope, that he should give his Niece Catherine de Medici to the Duke of Milan, his aim being to engage him, for his Niece's sake, in the defence of the Milanese, for fear in the end the King of France should find a favorable opportunity to gain him to his interest. But Clement allied against this Proposal, his engagement with the King of France, who had done him the honour to demand Catherine for the Duke his second Son. He represented to the Emperor, that he could not prefer the Duke of Milan to the Duke of Orleans, without making the King of France his irreconcilable enemy, who would never forgive such an affront. So their whole Negotiation ended only in the projected League, in which the Venetians refused to be included. They contented themselves with promising the Emperor, they would punctually perform their engagement with respect to the Duchy of Milan. In fine, the Emperor having sent for Ambassadors from Milan, Ferrara, and Mantua, it was endeavoured for some time to settle the terms of the League. But the dispute between the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara very much retarded the conclusion, because the Duke would not come into the League before he was secure of peace at home. However, after great pains, the Emperor prevailed with the Pope to allow the Duke an eight months respite. This affair was the reason the League could not be signed till February next year.

Henry's proceedings against the Clergy, and his disposition with regard to the Pope, greatly encouraged those who longed to see a Reformation in the Church. To conceive a right notion how the English stood affected in this respect, it is necessary to know what the People's Sentiments were concerning Religion. It may be undeniably affirmed, that as to the Reformation of the Pope's exorbitant Power, and the Clergy's Immunities, there was scarce an Englishman, if you except all or most of the Ecclesiastics, but what heartily wished it. It was now three hundred years since the Parliament first began to endeavour it, but without a perfect success, because it was contrary to the interest of the Kings. But as for a Reformation of Doctrine, the well-wishers to it were very far from being the majority. These were not sufficiently numerous to venture to propose it openly, especially as they were not countenanced by the King. But when the Pope's excessive authority, or the pride and riches of the Clergy were exclaimed against, they boldly joined with the rest of the People, without fear of being discovered, because that was the sentiment of all the People, or at least of almost all the Laity. But in expressing their zeal against the Clergy, their aim was to promote the Reformation of Doctrine, because they knew the chief obstacle would always proceed from the Governors of the Church. Here therefore they believed they ought to begin, in order to arrive at a thorough Reformation. So, among those that wished to reduce within due bounds the Papal Power, and the Clergy's Immunities, there were doubtless many who had no farther views, and imagined the Reformation would end there. Others, on the contrary, hoped that after taking this first step, it would be impossible to stop, wherein they had for warrant what had happened in Germany. But they took care not to undeceive the others, for fear of cooling their zeal, by shewing them too soon the consequences of the first step, in the business of the Reformation.

(1) Francis went back from Badeghem with Henry, in this Order, that while Francis was on French Ground, he gave place, but when he came to the English Pale, Henry gave him the precedence. Before this time, Henry, when he was in France, had been a good young Gentleman, but by the time he attended, met them. Burnet, T. III. p. 17.

1532.) The Parliament meeting the 15th of January 1532, the Commons were almost unanimously inclined to redress the Grievances so long complained of in vain, with respect to the Papal power, and the Ecclesiastical privileges. There had never been so favorable an opportunity. When formerly the Parliaments were expected to make any attempt of this nature, the Kings were unwilling to concur with them, because the State of their Affairs permitted them not to break entirely with Rome. But the Affairs of the Divorce had put things upon another foot. The King was dissatisfied with the Pope, and considered the Clergy, both Secular and Regular, as secret enemies, by reason of their attachment to the Court of Rome. So, his interest required, that the Pope and Clergy should be humbled, and division sown between them and the People, knowing that the former could hurt him only in proportion to their credit with the latter. As for what Foreigners might do, he thought himself in no danger, so long as he remained strictly united with France, and the more, as the Emperor was then employed by his war with the Turks, and the troubles of Germany.

All this being fully intimated to the Houle of Commons, they presented an Address to the King (1), praying him to consent to a Reformation of fundry Grievances, occasioned by the Immunities of the Clergy (2).
The King answered, that before he gave his consent to their request, which seemed to him of great moment, he wished to hear what the Clergy had to say for themselves.
But under this shew of equity, his intent was to intimate to the Clergy, how much they wanted his protection, since he could either promote or restrain the proceedings of the Commons: as he pleased. Some time after, the Parliament passed certain Acts, which only glanced at some of the Clergy's Privileges, the People had most reason to complain of (3). But at that time, the Reformation was carried no farther. Nay, contrary to ten to make the Ecclesiasticks amends, by passing an Act to relate them from the payment of Annates (4), which had become a heavy Burden. The Act ran, that the Kingdom was daily impoverished by the great Sums paid to the See of Rome, for First-Fruits, for Palls, for Bulls, &c. That since [the second Year of] the Reign of Henry VII., one hundred and sixty thousand Pounds had been paid to those uses, and that more was like to be shortly exported, because many of the Bishops were very aged. That besides, the Annates were first introduced only as a contribution for the War against the Infidels, to which however they were never applied. And therefore it was resolved, that all payments of Annates should cease for the future: That as for the Bulls, there should only be paid five Pounds in the hundred, according to the clear annual value of the Bishopricks. That if, on account of this regulation, Bulls should be denied by the Pope, the Bishop elect should be presented by the King to the Archbishop of the Province for his Consecration: That in case the Archbishop should refuse it on pretence of want of Palls, Bulls, and the like, any two Bishops appointed by the King should perform the Office, and the Bishop so consecrated acknowledged for lawful. Nevertheless the Parliament declared, it should be in the King's power to null or confirm the Act within such a time; and if in this Interval, he should make an amicable Composition with the Court of Rome, it should have the force and authority of a Law. But if, upon this Act, the Pope should pretend to vex the Realm by Excommunications or Interdicts, such censures should neither be regarded nor published, and,
all Interdicts notwithstanding, the Priests might lawfully, without any scruples of Conscience, celebrate Divine Service as before (5).

Mean while, among the great number of Representatives in the House of Commons, there were several who were entirely against a rupture with the Pope. They perceived however, it would infallibly follow upon the King's Divorce. Wherefore they used all possible endeavours to prevent it. One Tenise a Member of Parliament was so hardy as to move, that the House should go in a body and address the King to take his Queen again. Henry in hearing of this, sent for [Thomas Audley] the Speaker, and in his Person severely reprimanded the Commons, and suffering a motion to be made concerning an Affair which fell not under their Cognizance (6).

Some days after (7), the King fell again for the Specter, and told him, that having compared the Oath taken by the Bishops to the Pope, with that they took to the King, it seemed to him they were but half Subjects; and therefore he desired the Commons to examine the matter, and take care of the interell of the Crown. But the Plague which raged then at London, and constrained the Parliament to break up presently after (8), hindered the Commons from debating upon this Affair at that time (9).

The Power given the King by the Parliament to abolish the Annates, or make any amicable composition with the Pope, was a clear evidence that the Act had been procured by the Intrigues of the Court. The Pope was extremely offended at it. But when he complained to the King's Agents, he was told, he might have saved himself that vexation, and there was still a remedy, since the King's power to repeal the Act. This was an intimation, that he might depend upon it, the King would be according as he had reason to be satisfied with his proceedings.

Thomas More, who was Lord Chancellor, and a Per- Thomas son of excellent Judgment, foresaw now, the King's pro- More 1517 ceedings would in the end produce a total rupture with the Reformation. He would have readily consented that some abuses should be reformed. But he found, as Matters were man- the Great aged, the Reformation would go much farther than he desired. He put a great difference between withdrawing the entirely from the Pope's obedience, and retrenching some of his Ufurpations. So, being unwilling to be instru- the mental in the rupture, he resigned the Great-Seal on the 16th of May. Some days after, the King made Sir Thomas Audley, Lord Keeper of the Great-Seal, till the 16th of January 1533, when he was made Lord Chan- the cellor. p. 446.

Whilt Henry used fundry means to shew the Pope his danger, in oblatively refusing what he required, the Emperor was no less ardently endeavouring to obtain a sentence in favor of Queen Catherine. The way these two Monarchs applied to the Pope was not by humble in-terates, but by Menaces, which had the greater effect, as he was naturally timorous, and slow to resolve upon things that required a speedy resolution. By these two opposite demands he saw himself indeed between the hammer and Anvil, as he said himself in the beginning of the Affair. On the other hand, he found by Henry's late proceedings, that England was going to be loft to him and his Successors. This consideration was very capable of putting him upon seeking expedients to content that Monarch, without prejudice to the honor of the Holy See.
 He would thereby have preserved a Kingdom which had been ever devoted to the Popes, and from whence they had drawn large Revenues. But on the other hand, the Emperor had still an Army in Italy, and was able to revenge his refusal. Clement of all things feared the loss of Florence, which the Emperor could take from him with more ease than he had procured him the possession. It is no wonder therefore, if this fear, being the most immediate, prevailed. It would be a great mistake to ascribe this Pope any motives of Justice, Equity, Good, and benefit of the Church, or Religion. These things for some time had served only for preambles to Bulls. His own and his Family's interest was the sole rule of his conduct. So, finding himself extremely pressed by the Emperor to pass sentence upon Queen Catherine's appeal, he could no longer be excused from giving him some satisfaction (1). He declared therefore to the English Agents (2), that having long expected in vain that their Master would of himself return to the right way, he was obliged to cite him to Rome. Henry having notice of it, went with all speed Edward Karne, Doctor of Law, with the new Character of Excusator, to allege the reasons against a Citation to which the King of England could not be liable. Karne coming to Rome in March (3), the Pope refused to receive him as Excusator, a character whereof there was no precedent to be found in the Chancery. However, he committed the examination of this title to a Congregation, which made no haste to give their opinion, that the Excusator might not have power, before he was acknowledged, to oppose the resolutions already taken.

At last, in a Consistory the eighth of July, it was resolved, that, without examining the King of England's reasons for not appearing in Person, he should be intreated to send to Rome a Proxy to defend his Cause. Mean while, as the Vacation which was to last till the first of October, was then just begun, a delay till that time was tacitly given the King. During this Interval, the Pope sent him a Brief to require him to send a Proxy to Rome. At the same time he caused the following Overtures to be made him: That the affair of the Divorce should be examined in any indifferent place, by a Legate and two Auditors of the Rota; which done, the Pope himself would pass Sentence. Secondly, That all the Sovereign Princes of Christendom should agree to a Truce of three or four Years, within which time the Pope promised to call a General Council. The King replied, by Sir Thomas Elliot who was sent on purpose, That he could not agree to a Truce without the King of France's concurrence. Secondly, That it was not a proper juncture to call a Council. Lastly, As for the Affair of the Divorce, being King of England, he was to take care of the Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Laws of the Realm, which allowed not that any Process should be tried in a foreign Court. That besides the Canons of the Church expressly decreed, that all Matrimonial Causes should be judged in the Countries where the Parties resided.

To these reasons, he added, a protestation in form, declaring that he was not obliged to appear at Rome, either in Person or by Proxy, and tacked to this protestation the determinations of some Universities (4), he had consulted. However, he proposed three things to the Pope. First, he required that the Cause should be decided by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and two other Bishops, or else, by the whole Clergy of the Kingdom. But it must be observed, that the See of Canterbury had been vacant since August, by Warham's Death (5), and if the Pope had clofed with this Proposal, the King would not have failed to fill the See with a Prelate devoted to him. His second offer was, that the Cause should be judged by four Arbitrators, one to be named by the King (6), another by the Queen, a third by the King of France, and that the Archbishop of Canterbury should be the fourth. In the third place, he proposed that the Cause being judged by the Archbishop, or by Umpires, if the Queen should think fit to appeal from the Sentence, the appeal should be brought before three Judges, whereof he would name one, the Pope another, and the King of France a third. The Pope replied to these Proposals, that he saw the King would not recede from his pretended Rights, and therefore it should not be thought strange that he resolved to preserve his own.

It is however certain, if the Pope durst have satisfied the King, he would gladly have done it, by reason of his fear to lose England entirely. It was not the difficulties in the affair of the Divorce that hindered him from proceeding. Had they been much greater than they were, he would have readily overlooked them all. For, supposing the unlimited Power assumed by the Pope, it was as easy for Clement VII to null Henry's Marriage, as it was for Julius II to grant a Dispensation. But he had to manage the honor of his See, and the interest of the Emperor, who threatened him, and was able to execute his Threats. Had not the Emperor been concerned in the Affair, it would have been very easy to find an expedient to content the King, without prejudice to the papal Authority. It was only to assure the King, the Cause should be decided in his favor, and he would have willingly agreed that the Pope should have been the sole Judge. But the Pope could give him no such assurance by reason of the Emperor's opposition; and therefore Henry could not resolve to put the Affair into his hands at the hazard of being cast. Upon this account it was that he proposed inflexible expedients to gain his Cause. But on the other hand, the Pope could not accept of these expedients, without injuring his Dignity. Thus the Affair was solely retarded by the Emperor's interposition. Had it not been for him, the Pope would have contented the King, and the King would have submitted to the Pope, and remained as before, an obedient Son of the Holy See. Hence therefore it may be inferred, that the King's proceedings as well in the late Parliament as afterwards, flowed not so much from his real opinion, that the papal Authority was usurped, as from his seeing no other way to be delivered from his present difficulties, than by denying it to be in the Pope's power to do what Julius II had done. It is however very likely, he was afterwards fully convinced of the Truth of what he asserted at first only out of necessity. On the other hand, if the Pope passed sentence against Henry, as we shall see presently, it was not from a belief that his Marriage with Catherine was lawful, but solely to save the honor of the Holy See, and through fear of, or complaisance for, the Emperor. And here who can forbear admiring the secret ways of Providence, which rendered a reconciliation between the Pope and the King impracticable, in order to produce an event which was to be attended with so momentous consequences for England?

At length the vacation being over, Henry was cited the fourth of October to appear at Rome, either in Person or by Proxy, and Karne solemnly protested (7) against the Citation. What has been said happened before the Emperor's arrival at Bologna. Clement VII, who was going, immediately after the Citation, to confer with that Prince, promised Karne, that all proceedings should be suspended so long as the Emperor was in Italy. This was all the favor Karne could obtain (8).

Whilst Henry seemed wholly employed in the Affair of his Divorce, a quarrel arose between England and Scotland. Buchanan pretends, Henry willing to take advantage of his Union with France, and imagining, Francis I, would suffer him to oppress King James, made incursions into Scotland (9) as if he intended to renew the War. He adds, that the only pretence of this rupture, was, that the Scots had spoken some injurious words against the English. Be this as it will, the King of Scotland being prepared for his defence, Henry thought not fit to pursue his design. He chose rather to agree, that the difference should be decided by the King of France's mediation, who for that purpose sent an Ambassador to Newcastle. The King of Scotland was so offended with Francis for so coolly espousing his Cause, that he was going to join with the Emperor. But at length all was happily adjusted, and the two Kings of England and Scotland remained Friends as before.

It was not for Henry's interest to undertake a War against Scotland, when he was to prepare for his defence against the Emperor. It was extremely probable, the Pope had not engaged to judge Queen Catherine's appeal without being first assured, that the Emperor, the Queen's Nephew, would execute the sentence. This indeed was his design, but the troubles which came upon him, hindered his engaging in that enterprise. He reckoned that the Italian League before-mentioned, would be a sure defence for the Duchy of Milan. But he soon perceived, he was himself the dupe of the politic Pope. This League was at length signed at Bologna the 24th of February 1533, according to his wish. Every Sovereign that had Dominions in Italy, the Venetians excepted, engaged to find a certain Sum monthly, for the maintenance of an Army which Antonio de Leva was to command as General of the League. The Emperor's intention was, that the Army should consist of his own Troops, and be constantly maintained: But the design of the Confederates was very different. They had consented to the League, only that the Emperor, having nothing to fear for Italy, might withdraw all his Troops. But they never meant that the Army, maintained at their expence, should serve to

They represented to him therefore, that the League being only defensive, it was not proper to continue an Army without necessity, to ruin them in expenses; but upon the first motion of the French, they would not fail to perform their agreements. What arguments soever the Emperor alleged, it was not possible to bring them to what he desired. He was forced therefore to be satisfied with their promises, because he was not in condition to maintain an Army in Italy at his own charge. Then he disbanded part of his troops, and sent the rest to Naples and Spain. He departed from Bologna about the end of February, and came to Genoa, where he staid some time; after which, on the 8th of April, he embarked for Spain, extremely displeased with the Pope, who through all his disguises could not help showing his inclination to France. Indeed, he was now agreed with the Cardinals of Tournon and Grammont upon an interview with Francis, and the Marriage of Catherine de Medici with the Duke of Orleans.

The State of Italy was not the only thing that employed the Emperor. He had, as was observed, promised the Protestants a free Council in Germany. But though the word Free was equally used by those who demanded a Council, and by him that promised it, they were far from meaning the same thing. The Protestants understood by that word, that a Council should be held in Germany, where not only they might have free access and full liberty to produce their reasons, but also that the points in dispute should be decided solely by the Word of God. The Emperor meant, on the contrary, to retain only an outward show of the Word, and by rendering his Party superior in the Council, to cause Matters to be so decided, that the Protestants should be forced, either to revoke all their Innovations, or reject the Council's decisions. In the latter case, which was most likely, the Emperor plainly perceived, they would give him a pretence to attack them, which was the thing he intended. But in the execution of this design a great obstacle occurred; namely, a Council, let it be what it would, was a terror to the Pope. Though he knew the Emperor demanded a Council not with intent to alter Religion, yet he was afraid of being sacrificed to the Protestants, if that Monarch's interest required it. Besides, the strict Alliance between Francis and Henry made him uneasy. In short, he could not resolve to call a Council, without being sure of managing it as he pleased. And this could scarce be expected, as Matters then stood in Christendom. Since his being on the papal Throne, he had pleased neither the Emperor, nor the King of France, nor the King of England, nor the Potentates of Italy, and yet, of the Subjects of all these Sovereigns was the Council chiefly to consist. He knew himself to be a Bachelor, and that alone to be sufficient to depose him, in case his enemies were superior in the Council. What had passed at Constance and Basle gave him just reason to dread, that a Council, held in a free City of Germany, might form the same designs. Upon all these considerations, when the Emperor desired him, at the conference of Bologna, to call a Council, he forbore to give a positive answer. He contented himself with committing the examination of his request to certain Cardinals, under colour of being informed of the reasons Pro and Con. The Popes have a character to sustain, which often throws them into great perplexity. In publick, they must make show of a great zeal for God's Glory, for Religion, and for the Good of the Church; and withal of a great disinterestedness for every thing which personally concerns them. But, for fear what they thus profess outwardly should be taken literally, they must in private deceive those who treat with them, and discover to them, that their own interest is the principal subject of the Negotiation. So, what they say publickly, is always just and right, and seems to tend only to the greater Glory of God. But in the end it is too frequently perceived, that Religion serves only for a cloak to their temporal concerns. On the present occasion, a General Council seemed absolutely necessary to put an end to the troubles caused by the religious differences in several places, and particularly in Germany. The Pope not only agreed upon a Council with the Emperor, but even teigned to wish it heartily. Mean while, as a Council was contrary to his interests, reasons, drawn from the good and advantage of Religion, were to be found to reject it, or defer the convening. This was done by the Commissioners, appointed to examine the Emperor's request. They drew a Memorial, setting forth the necessity of a Council, but showing withal the inconveniences of admitting the Protestants to dispute upon Matters already settled, and the uselessness of the same Council if they were not admitted. This Memorial being communicated to Francis, he replied to it by another, demonstrating, that the inconveniences mentioned in the first ought not to hinder the calling of a Council. Moreover, he particularly alledged out the methods which were to be used, to banish all partiality. But this Memorial was not acceptable to the Emperor, because a free Council was not what he desired, but a Council that would afford him an opportunity and pretence to attack the Protestants of Germany; after which, he did not despair of bringing the Catholics also under his yoke. Francis answered the Emperor's reasons against his Memorial, but it was to no purpose. It was almost impossible that two Princes, whose Interests were so opposite, and who were so jealous of each other, should agree in any one point. Thus the Pope had his wish, since the calling of the Council was deferred to a more proper Season. I must now speak of what passed in England in the year 1533.

Whilst the Pope and Emperor were conferring at Bologna, Henry assembled the Parliament the 4th of February. As hitherto the Pope had not relaxed in the least, except that he had delayed the Excommunication, where with he had threatened the King, it was deemed proper to proceed farther, and let him see, he was not at all feared. So, the Parliament passed an Act, expressly forbidding all Appeals to Rome, on pain of incurring a Præmunire. This was to convince the Pope, there was no occasion for him, since at the very time that the point in question between him and the King was, to know whether the affair of the Divorce should be judged in England, People were forbid to carry their Appeals to Rome. But there was another reason which induced the King to procure this Act; namely, having heard that Francis was going to make an Alliance with the Pope, he imagined that for the future his Friend would act but faintly in his favor; and therefore he was now determined to have his cause tried in the Kingdom, without troubling himself any farther about the Pope's proceedings against him (1).

The Archbishoprick of Canterbury being vacant by Warham's death, it was necessary to fill the See, that the sentence might be given by the Primate of England. Wherefore, Henry had cast his Eyes on Dr. Thomas Cranmer, then in Germany (2). But, contrary to his expectation, he had found the Doctor more averie to accept, than others would have been eager to desire that high Dignity. It was six months before he could be persuaded to take upon him that burden. In fine, his reluctance being conquered by the King's patience, he began his journey to London, though very slowly, in hopes the King might alter his mind. However, as a farther delay was directly contrary to the King's measures, Cranmer could no longer defer submitting to his Will. The King himself undertook to demand his Bulls (3), which, though eleven in all, were rated but at nine hundred Ducats (4). The Pope forbore of his own accord to require the Annates, foreseeing they would be refused. To enable Cranmer to be at this charge, the King made him a present of the revenues of the Archbishoprick, from the 9th of September last Year. These obstacles being removed, there arose another much more considerable. Cranmer refused to take the usual Oath to the Pope, believing he could not do it with a safe conscience. In his first journey into Germany he had read Luther's Books, which entirely convinced him of the truth of many of the Protestant Tenets, and particularly of the little foundation in Scripture, for the spiritual power assumed by the Pope over the whole Church. Consequently, he could not

By the act, he was, upon the King's Nomination, promoted to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury; this is directed to the King. By a second directed to him, if he is made Archbishop. By a third, he is absolved from all Censures. A fourth is to the Synagoga. A fifth to the Dean and Chapter. A sixth to the Clergy of Canterbury. A seventh to all the Livery in his See. An eighth to all that held Lands of it, requiring them to receive him as Archbishop. All these are dated February 21, 1533. By a 9th of February 22, he was to be consecrated, upon taking the Oath in the Pontifical. By a tenth, dated the 2d of March, the Pal was sent him. And by an eleventh of the same date, the Archbishop of York, and the 10th of London, were required to pay on him. Mean while, Henry considering Cranmer, as a Person who by his principles and resolution could effectually serve him in the decision of the affair of the Divorce, of which he desired to see the end, pressed him to earnestly to swear the customary Oath, that he was prevailed with at length, by an expedient propoed to him; namely, to make a formal protestation against the Oath he was to take (1). This is by no means one of his most commendable actions. However, he was consecrated the 13th of March, according to Burnet. And yet, the King put him not in possession of the Temporalities till the 29th of April. This gives occasion to suspect, there is a mistake in the first of these dates.

This affair being ended, the King required the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury to give their opinion upon these two points. First, whether Pope Julus's dispensation for the King's Marriage with Catherine was sufficient, and able to render such a Marriage valid? Secondly, whether it was sufficiently proved that Arthur had consummated his Marriage with Catherine? Whereupon, the Convocation declared on the 5th of April, that the Pope had not power to dispense contrary to the Law of God, and that the Consummation of Arthur's Marriage was proved, as far as a thing of that nature could be. The Convocation of York made the like decision the 13th of May following.

Whilst the Clergy were employed in debating these points, Henry writ to Francis, desiring him to send a trusty Person, to whom he might discover some things which he would not make publick. Whereupon Francis sent William de Bellay Lord of Langeais, ordering him to acquaint the King, that he had concluded a Marriage between his second Son the Duke of Orleans, and Catherine de Medici, and that the Pope and himself were to meet at Marsilles, to celebrate the Nuptials: That in such a juncture he believed his presence would be very necessary to negotiate his own affairs himself with the Pope; but in case he did not think proper to be at the Interview, he would do well to send some person on his part. Langeais being come to London, the King told him, that Clement VII. having obstinately refused to appoint him Judges in England, he had determined at length to proceed; and therefore had already espoused Ann Bullen, with a resolution to have his Marriage nullified by the Archbishop of Canterbury. That however, he would keep his second Marriage private till May, to see what the King of France could do with the Bishop of Rome (for so he called the Pope.) But if he could obtain nothing, his design was to withdraw himself wholly from the Papal authority. He imagined then, the Pope and Francis would meet in May, but it was not till October. He told Langeais further, that he had composed a Treatise upon the Incroachments of the Bishops of Rome, and the Prerogatives of sovereign Princes; but would not publish it, till he saw no hopes of reconciliation.

Remark on this Subjoin.

Shortly after, the King's Marriage with Ann Bullen was made publick, which certainly was very wrong. Since the King was resolved to have his first Marriage nullified by the Archbishop of Canterbury, he should have staid till the Sentence was pronounced. All that can be said in excuse of this irregular conduct, is, that the new Queen was four months gone with Child, and her breeding could hardly be concealed any longer. But notwithstanding this, the King might have caused his first Marriage to be nullified a little sooner, or the second to be published a little later, since there was but a month between the publication and the sentence. However this be, Henry despairing to prevail with the Pope, and not much fearing him, thought to have no farther regard either for him or the Publick, being almost assured of succeeding in whatever he undertook, considering how the People stood affected. In short, being fully determined to end the affair, he so ordered, that the Archbishop of Canterbury demanded his leave to summon Queen Catherine. Before he came to this extremity, he tried more than once to persuade the Queen to consent to the Divorce. But all his endeavours proving ineffectual, he granted the Archbishop the leave he desired. The Queen was therefore cited to appear at Dunstable, in the neighbourhood of the place where she resided, the 20th of May (2). But as she refused to appear, the Archbishop gave Sentence the 23d of the same month, declaring the King's Marriage with

Thus ended this famous Process, the issue whereof afforded no less matter for divers reflections than the beginning, every one reasoning, as swayed by prejudice or interest. Those who were against the King took notice of his error in espousing a second Wife, before his first Marriage was legally dissolved. They said moreover, that of all the Prelates in England, Cranmer was the last that should have been chosen for Judge, since he had so openly declared against the first Marriage. That his partiality was apparent, not only in his haste to give Sentence, but also in his confirming the King's second Marriage, which had been consummated whilst the first still subsisted.

Those who were for the King, affirmed, the Sentence was but a mere formality, which rendered not the Marriage void, but only declared it so. That it sufficed, the Sentence was conformable to the determinations of the English Clergy, and all the Universities in Europe, and to the sentiments of the Pope himself, who would have nullified the Marriage, had he not been biased by worldly considerations. They justified Cranmer, by alleging, that having changed his Character since his declaring for the Divorce, that declaration ought not to hinder him from being Judge, no more than a Lawyer when he comes to sit on the Bench is debarred the trying of Causes in which he formerly gave Counsel. That though there were some default in the Form, it could not be denied, the Sentence was just in itself, which was sufficient to quiet the King's Conscience, who alone was concerned in the affair. As for the new Queen, no fault could be found with her conduct, since she proved not with Child till after her Marriage, whether the King espoused her in November last year, or in the January following. As for Queen Catherine, it could not be thought strange that she should maintain the validity of her second Marriage. But it was justly wondered at, she should so obstinately deny the Consummation of the first, which was proved by all possible evidence. But as most people were then biased on one side or other (3), we are not to judge of this affair by what was published in those days, but by Reason and Equity. Let us therefore briefly consider it in that view, independently of the prejudices caused by the consequences. It will not perhaps be unacceptable to the Reader, to see here a short Recapitulation of the conduct of the chief Actors in this Scene. I shall confine my self to this, without fully examining the Process, which is not so much the business of a Historian as of a Divine or Civilian.

leged for the King.

It is almost impossible to know positively, whether Henry, when he undertook the affair of the Divorce, was convinced that his Marriage was contrary to the Law of God, or at least, really troubled in Conscience upon that account. All that can be said in his favour, is, that he himself affirmed as much, and none but the searcher of all hearts can know, whether he thought as he spoke. It cannot be denied, that the sole consideration of such a Marriage is of itself capable of breeding such scruples, especially as the King's might be confirmed by the Archbishop of Canterbury's, and the Bishop of Lincoln's his Confessor. But, on the other hand, it may be conjectured from several circumstances, that it was only a pretence to put away Catherine, and marry Ann Bullen. In the first place, he had lived eighteen years with the Queen, without showing any scruple. In the second place, if he was not in love with Ann Bullen, when his scruples first seized him, it cannot be denied, he was very much so, when he most ardently pressed the affair of the Divorce. So, it may be conjectured, that his love might turn into belief, what at first was only a doubt. In the third place, very probably it was Cardinal Wolsey that inspired, by himself or another, the King with these scruples, to be revenged of the Emperor and the Queen. This bold and daring Minister imagined, either the affair would easily succeed, considering his great credit at the Court of Rome, or in case of opposition, it would be no more difficult on this than on several other occasions, to cause the King to alter his mind. But Henry's Love unexpectedly happening, Wolsey found he had taken wrong measures. Besides, the determinations of the Universities did not a little con-

(1) This Protestation imported, That he did not intend by that Oath, to restrain himself from any thing that he was bound to, either by his Duty to God, to the King, or the Country; and that he renounced every thing in it that was contrary to any of those.

(2) The Archbishop went to Dunstable (about six Miles from Amptill where the Queen was) accompanied with Cardinal Bishop of Winchester, and the Bishops of London, Bath, and Lincoln, and late in Court on the 20th of May, the King appearing by Proxy, and the Queen not at all. Upon which the two last Citations were issued out. Then the Evidence that had been brought before the Legates of the Determinations of the Universities, Divines, and Canonists, with the Judgment of the Convocations of both Provinces were produced, and the whole Merit of the Cause was opened. And then on the 23d, with the Advice of all that were present, it was declared, that the Marriage had been only de facto, and not de jure, and consequently void from the beginning. One thing is to be observed, that the Archbishop is called in the Sentence, The Legate of the Apostolical See. Whether this went of course as one of his Titles, or was put in to make the Sentence firmer, the Reader may judge.

tribute, without doubt, to confirm the King in his opinion. However, without farther inquiry whether Henry was fatished of the justice of his Cause, let us consider, in few words, how he behaved in so nice an affair. He supposed, that Julius II could not grant a dispensation for his Marriage, and consequently the Marriage was void of itself. And yet, he thought he wanted Clement VII's Bull to declare it so. Herein was a contradiction which could not but greatly embarrass him. If Julius's dispensation was null by the Law of God, it was needless to revoke it; and if a revocation was necessary, consequently it was good till revoked. Thus, Henry was bound, till the Pope should please to decide the point. Wherefore, when Cranmer had given him another notion of this affair, by intimating to him, that, independently of the power assumed by the Pope, the chief thing was to be assured of the Right, by the opinions of the Learned, he cried out in a transport of joy, He had got at last the right Snuff by the ear; that is, he found in Cranmer's advice a Solution of the difficulties, he could not get clear of, in following the doubtful Principle of the Pope's power, because its extent was not settled. He resolved therefore to procure the opinions of the Universities. But at length, weighing the consequences of a rupture with Rome, he refused the first way, and applied again to the Pope. By this he wronged his Cause very much; for in taking the Pope for Judge, it was no longer in his power to limit the authority he was willing to acknowledge. But he was excusable, since it was hardly possible to throw off at once his prejudice with respect to the Papal power, whereof he had not at first to clear an Idea as afterwards. Then, finding the Pope acted only from worldly considerations, which hindered him from giving him the satisfaction he required, he returned to the way he had left. So, proceeding upon his own conviction, and the determinations of the Universities, he caused his Marriage to be declared null, without regarding the Pope's authority, which he was resolved to forsake. I omit the Reasons he alleged to prove the necessity of his Divorce. That of Conscience was doubtless the best, if sincere. That relating to the uncertainty of the Succession was proper to demand a Sentence, but not to ground the Divorce upon; because the Divorce supposed the Marriage void, which was to be judged.

Remarks on the Pope.

Let us now consider the Pope's conduct, where we find nothing favoring of Christ's Vicar. Clement VII never examined the Cause by the maxims of Religion, Justice, or Equity, but always with respect to his own or his Family's interest. If he had attended to what Religion required, he would have examined, whether Henry's Marriage was contrary to the Law of God, and whether, in that case, a Pope had power to grant a dispensation. If he had been convinced that Julius II assumed a Right which belonged not to him, he should have readily granted Henry the Bull he demanded. But if, on the contrary, he was persuaded, the Marriage was agreeable to the divine Law, or not being so, it was in the power of a Pope to grant a dispensation, he should have confirmed it, and tried to remove the King's scruples, without seeking for many evasions. That was the duty of a Pope. But instead of acting in this manner, he considered only what good or hurt might accrue to him from the King's demand, independently of the justice or injustice of the thing. Whilst he was Prisoner in the Castle of St. Angelo, or Fugitive at Orvieto, and thought he stood in need of Henry, he positively promised to content him. Afterwards, he only amused him, till, by the Emperor's means, he had recovered Florence. As soon as he was in possession of that State, which he had so much desired, he advocated the Process to Rome, but, in all appearance, with intent never to decide it, if he could help it; because whilst the two Parties remained uncertain of the decision, he made himself necessary to both. Can it therefore be said, there was any sign of Justice or Religion in his proceedings? Certainly, if Henry was to blame, as it is pretended, to feign scruples on purpose to gratify his passion, Clement was no less so, not to try to reclaim him before the affair was begun, or to content him in case his scruples were well-grounded. Though Henry had acted only through passion, which is however very uncertain, he would have been much more excusable than the Pope, who, in the Post he filled, ought to have proceeded upon very different Principles.

As for the Emperor, he undoubtedly acted in this affair from motives of Honour, Interest, and Policy, without Justice or Religion being concerned in his Proceedings. He looked upon the Queen of England, his Aunt's Divorce, as a dishonor, which, added to his interest to create Henry troubles, who was in strict alliance with France, was but too capable of inducing him to obstruct it to the utmost of his power.

As for Queen Catherine, very probably, she acted with Sincerity. As she believed the Pope's authority unlimited, she thought herself the King's lawful Wife, and in that belief, did not think herself obliged to resign her Right to another, on pretence of the King her Husband's scruples, which, in her opinion, were groundless. Besides, she could not own her Marriage null, without greatly injuring her Daughter the Princess Mary. Though she had been convinced her Marriage was lawful in itself, she believed the Pope had power to render it valid, being ready however to submit to the same authority as soon as it should be declared. Nevertheless, she may be justly suspected of having taken a false Oath, to make her cause better.

Much has been said against Ann Bullen. But without Upon Ann Bullen inflicting upon Sander's Invektives, which have been sufficiently refuted (1), she can be charged, before Marriage, but with one single Fault, namely, her yielding to the King before his Marriage with Catherine was nulled. But it was very difficult for a young Lady of her rank, to have resolution enough to resist the temptation of being a Queen, if she could be so lawfully, as it is likely the King made her believe. It cannot however be said, she yielded to the King's desires before her Marriage. He espoused her at the latest in January, and she was not brought to bed till September (2). So there is nothing in that which can give occasion for any suspicion.

As for the rest who were concerned in this affair, as Upon the Cardinals, and the King's, and the Emperor's Ministers, it may be affirmed, they acted only from worldly views, without any regard to Religion.

It cannot be said, the Universities of France and England decided the Questions proposed with entire freedom. Since it is known what an influence Sovereigns have upon the actions of their Subjects, when they are concerned, As to the Universities of Italy, both Parties accused one another of having corrupted them, the one by Money, and the other by Threats. As for the English Clergy, they had lately received such a Check, that they had reason to dread giving the King a fresh occasion of anger. But it cannot be thence inferred, that they decided contrary to their Sentiments, since it often happens, the truth is not opposite to our interest. The same may be said of Cranmer, who being now tainted with Luther's Doctrine, could not look upon Julius's dispensation as capable of rendering a Marriage valid, which in itself was null and repugnant to the Law of God. Indeed, he may have earnestly embraced this opportunity, to give a mortal wound to the Papal Authority, in order to promote the Reformation. But it cannot be affirmed, that he acted against his knowledge, in pronouncing the Sentence of Divorce. At least, his whole behaviour was directly opposite to such obliquities.

By what has been said, it may be easily perceived, that in this affair, which was properly a case of Conscience, very few of the Actors had any but political views, without much regard to the precepts of Religion. Nevertheless, God who directs all the actions of Men, without their knowing very often themselves to what they may tend, drew from the proceedings of Henry, Clement, and Charles, the end he designed, that is, the Reformation of the Church of England, as will be seen in the sequel. If any one desires fully to examine the case of Henry VIII's Divorce, he would do well to cast off all prejudices, and take care not to be misled by the Authors who have written on this subject. But if a Man is contented with examining it historically, he is to consider only the political views of the principal Actors.

The sentence of Divorce being made publick, Henry Catherine took care to acquaint Catherine with it, by the Lord Mounjion, who tried in vain to persuade her to submit. She still remained inflexible, affirming, she would be the King's Wife till the Pope had nulled the Marriage. This answer being brought to the King, he ordered her to be confined. But the Prince's Dowager of Wales. But the

(1) Sander has assured the World, That the King taking her Mother, sent her Husband Sir Thomas Bullen Ambassador to France, and in his Absence began Ann Bullen up to his Wife. At his Return, he sued a Divorce against her in the Archbishop's Court, but the King letting him know he was with Child by her, he was, upon the King's desire, reconciled to his Wife. Thus Ann Bullen, though she went under the name of Sir Thomas's Daughter, yet was of the King's begotting. As he says, she was not till he had and used, had six Fingers, a Gap-Tooth, and a Tumour under her Chin. At seven Years of Age, he says, both her Father's Butler and Chaplain lay with her; and when in France she led such a dissolute Life, that she was called a English Whore. That the French King liking her, he was called the King's Male. But returning to England, she gave the King's Affection by the appearance of a severe Virtue which she enjoyed herself. The same Author adds, That the King had several times seduced her Sister with a premeditated view to the Divorce of this Lady and her Family. Hence we may see to what a height of Rancour and Malice History and Legend in vulgar Matters are capable of carrying a Man. Burnet, T. I. p. 41.

Shortly after, he notified his Divorce, and new Marriage to all the Sovereigns, and particularly to the Emperor, who coldly told the English Ambassador (2), he would consider what he was to do in the case.

The news of the King's Marriage, and the Archbishop of Canterbury's Sentence having reached Rome, the Pope was extremely angry with Henry, and the more, as a Copy of his Book against the Papal authority had now appeared in Rome itself. The Cardinals of the Imperial Faction improving this occasion, very earnestly pressed him to give sentence against the King, remonstrating to him, that if he refused not such an affront, the authority of the Holy See would be at an end: These Remonstrances produced their effect. The Pope nullified the Archbishop's Sentence, and declared that the King himself was liable to Excommunication, unless, by September next, he restored the Cause to its former state (3). He contented himself for this time with only threatening him, because he did not yet despair of reclaiming him by the King of France's means, with whom he was going to confer at Marjailles.

The Pope's aim in this Interview was, first to celebrate the Nuptials between Catherine's Niece, and the Duke of Orleans. In the next place, to devise with Francis some expedient to adjust his differences with the King of England, or if that could not be done, to disengage Francis from Henry's interest. Francis wished with all his heart, that some way might be found to reconcile them, because he hoped to join in a League with both, the more easily to recover the Duchy of Milan. Henry had used his utmost endeavors to disengage him from this Interview, being apprehensive it would produce between Francis and Clement an Union which could not but be to his prejudice (4). He had ever reckoned that Francis would act in concert with him to frighten the Pope, and that their menaces would induce him at last to give him the satisfaction he required. But perceiving he could not prevail, he had published his Marriage. From that time, he was fully bent to widen the breach with Rome, unless the Pope and the King of France should find, during their Interview, some satisfactory expedient, for which he was very willing to wait.

Mean while, he sent the Duke of Norfolk (5) in Embassy to Francis, with orders to accompany him to Marjailles, and see whether there was yet any hopes of agreement. The Duke of Norfolk coming to the French Court the 1st of July, waited upon the King who was then on his Journey to Marjailles (6), intending however to make some stay in Languedoc, before he went to the Congress. He accompanied him some time, but hearing, the beginning of August, what was done at Rome against the King his Master, would have returned, imagining his presence would be of little service at Marjailles. Nevertheless, at the King of France's solicitation, he contented himself with sending the Lord Rochfort for fresh instructions from the King, who immediately recalled him. However, Francis so artfully managed Henry, that he persuaded him to send some Person to Marjailles, to be a witness of what should pass at the Interview. Henry made choice of Stephen Gardiner, [Sir John Wallop] and Sir Francis Brian, with Edmund Bonner, a very proper Person to execute the orders he gave him.

The Pope and Francis met at Marjailles the beginning of October, and within a few days, the Duke of Orleans consummated his Marriage with Catherine de Medici (7). This affair being ended, Francis solicited the Pope in behalf of the King of England, and prevailed with him at last to give Henry entire satisfaction; but, to save the honor of the Holy See, he would judge the cause himself in a Consistory, from which the Cardinals of the Emperor's Faction should be excluded. Thus far all went very well. But Bonner, to whom doubtless it was not thought fit to discover this secret, demanding an Audience of the Pope (8), acquainted him with the King his Master's Appeal to the next General Council, from the sentence given or to be given against him. The Pope told him, before he declared himself, he would advise with the Cardinals that were with him. Some days after (9), having sent for Bonner, he gave him for answer, that according to the opinion of the Cardinals, the Appeal was unlawful. Bonner, without being surprised at this answer, acquainted him in the same manner with the like Appeal of the Archbishop of Canterbury, from the sentence which nullified his judgment for the Divorce. This put the Pope into such a rage, that he talked of throwing Bonner into a Cauldron of melted Lead (10). Guicciardini says, Francis was so offended with Bonner's insolence, that he offered the Pope to do all that lay in his power to procure him satisfaction for this affront. But if this be true, it was only a mere compliment.

Clement departed from Marjailles the 12th of November, as much pleased with the King of France as he was disatisfied with Henry. Mean while, Francis not despairing yet to adjust this affair, sent into England John de Bello-Bellay Bishop of Paris, to propound new expedients to the King. This Prelate, who had resided some time at the Court of England as Ambassador, wrought to with Henry, that he persuaded him at length to agree to an expedient he proposed to him (11). So, pleased with having obtained more than he durst have expected, he very readily undertook to carry the good news himself to the Pope, though it was then in the depth of Winter. He found the Pope inclined to do what he could to end the affair amicably, and drew from him a positive promise, that the cause should be judged at Cambray by such as the King of England should have no reason to except against. But Clement not trusting entirely to a verbal promise, desired to have it under the King's own hand, that he approved of what was concerted. Moreover, to avoid all delays and evasions, he fixed the day for the return of the Courier, who was to be sent into England.

This weighty affair being thus upon the point of conclusion, the Emperor's Agents were very urgent with the Pope to revoke his engagement; but he told them he had given his word. However, they repeated their instances with such earnestness, that at length they got him to promise, if Henry's answer came not by the time appointed, he should think himself disengaged. The Courier not returning on the day appointed, the Imperialists pressed the Pope to give sentence against Henry, representing to him that he was amused, and threatening him with the Emperor's resentment. In short, they so ardently sollicitated him, that though the Bishop of Paris only desired a delay of six days, he could not obtain it. The Pope, frightened by the menaces of the Imperialists, was so entirely devoted to them, that what should have been done, according to the usual forms, in three Consistories, was done in one. In a word, the Pope, without staying for an answer from England, published a sentence (12), declaring Henry's marriage with Catherine good and lawful, and requiring him to take his Wife again, with denunciation of Censures in case of disobedience. Two days after came the Courier with full Powers for the Bishop of Paris, as the Pope had desired. Several Cardinals moved to revoke what had been done; but the Emperor's Party pressed him so closely, that the motion was rejected. Thus the Pope, who had amused the King for six years by affected delays, could not be persuaded to grant him six days, and by this precipitation, was the cause of the Romish Church's loss of the Kingdom of England.

It must however be confessed, that it is very difficult to conceive what the King's view was in the agreement he pretended to make with the Pope. Can it be supposed he meant to quit his newly acquired Title of Supreme Head of the Church of England? But he appeared so jealous, during the rest of his days, of this Supremacy, of God, on condition that part of the money thence arising should be paid into the King's Exchequer (1). Moreover, all Religious Houses, exempt and not exempt, should be subject to the Archbishop's Visitation (2).

Statut. c. 22.

By another Act, it was enacted that the King's Marriage with Catherine, Widow of his Brother, Prince Arthur, should be held null and void, and that she should be reputed only Princess Dowager of Wales. On the contrary, the King's Marriage with Ann Bullen is declared valid, and the Succession to the Crown settled upon their Issue. Moreover, it is said that any Person of what quality soever, who shall speak or write against the King's Marriage, shall be adjudged a Traitor to the King and State, and that all the King's Subjects, without distinction, shall be obliged to swear, they will observe and maintain the contents of this Act. After this, follows a List of the Marriages forbid by the Law of God, among which is that of a Man with his Brother's Widow; and it was enacted, that no such Marriages should be allowed for the future, and that such as were then in being should be dissolved.

The People rejoice at it.

Thus was the papal authority abolished in England by Act of Parliament. Indeed, there were few Bishops and Abbots present when the Act passed (3). However, there was but one single Bishop who refused to set his name to it, because they made a great difference between submitting to an Act passed by a lawful Authority, and giving their vote for it. The generality of the People expressed great joy to see themselves freed from a yoke, which neither they nor their Forefathers could bear. None but the Monks exclaimed against it, and drew upon themselves the King's indignation, the effects whereof they afterwards felt. Those who wished for the Reformation, were highly pleased to see the main obstacle removed, believing the rest would quickly follow. But this Reformation, which they so impatiently expected, made not, in this Reign, all the Progress, they imagined they had reason to hope.

Oath taken by the Subjects according to the Act.

Act. Pub. XIV. p. 487. Sec. 527. Burnet. T. I. p. 146.

The Parliament breaking up the 30th of March (4), after all the Members had sworn to observe what was enjoined in the fore-mentioned Act, the King sent Commissioners throughout the Kingdom, to administer the same Oath to all his Subjects. The Collection of the Public Acts contains the Oaths of several Abbots and Fryers of all Orders to this effect: That they would be faithful to the King, the Queen, their Heirs and Successors: That they owned the King for supreme head of the Church of England: That the Bishop of Rome has no more jurisdiction than any other Bishop: That they renounced his Obedience: That they would preach sincerely Doctrines agreeable to the Holy Scriptures! That in their Prayers, they would pray first for the King as supreme head of the Church of England, then for the Queen [and her Issue], and lastly, for the Archbishop of Canterbury (5). Some time after, Lee Archbishop of York certified by a writing of the 5th of May, that in the Convocation of his Province it was declared, the Pope had no more power in England than any other Bishop. Only John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More late Chancellor, refused to sign the Act of Parliament, which, as has been seen, contained three principal Articles; the succession of the Crown, the nullity of the King's first Marriage, with the validity of his second, and the abolishment of the Papal authority. They offered to sign the first Article; but for the other two, they said, their Conscience would not suffer them to consent to them, whereupon they were committed to the Tower (6).

Whilst these Oaths were administering throughout the Kingdom, the King sent the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Durham (7) to tell Catherine, she must forbear assuming the Title of Queen, and lay before her the reasons that moved the Parliament to deprive her of it. But she replied, She believed her Marriage with the King good and lawful, and should hold it as such to her dying day: That she had never consummated her Marriage with Prince Arthur; and they who affirmed it, spoke not the truth: That she was not bound to submit to the Archbishop of Canterbury's Sentence, since the Pope had nullified it, and decreed the contrary (8): That the King's Marriage with Ann was not valid, as being made during the Appeal: That she was not obliged to submit to the Acts of the Parliament, not being the King's Subject, but his Wife: That besides, these Acts were made by the King's Subjects, upon an affair wherein he was party.

Though Henry would have been very glad of Catherine's submission to what the Parliament had enacted, it was not her obstinacy that gave him the most uneasiness. The Emperor having undertaken to execute the Pope's sentence, Henry was naturally to expect to be attacked by that powerful enemy. In order therefore to prevent him, or to put himself in a state of defence, he desired to make a League with the King of France, by a new Treaty, which should render their union more effectual for their common defence. Francis seemed very ready to comply, but meant that all the Terms should be to his advantage, and to make Henry subservient to his designs elsewhere. He had still an eye upon the Duchy of Milan, as upon what belonged to him of right, and had been unjustly taken from him, and designed to recover it, though he had expressly renounced it by the Treaty of Cambray. To this end he had sacrificed the honour of his House, in marrying his second Son to a Bastard-Branch of the Family of the Medici, because he did not think he could proceed without the Pope. But on the other hand, he was afraid of losing the fruit of that Alliance, by uniting too closely with the King of England, whom the Pope could now consider but as an open enemy. In this perplexity, he endeavoured to persuade Henry to act only privately, by sending large Sums to the German Protestants, to foment the dissension between them and the Emperor, and embroil him so, as to hinder him from thinking of Italy. Henry did not absolutely reject the Proposal. He was very willing to assist the Protestants with a good sum of Money: but pretended withal, that Francis should attack Newarre with a powerful Army, whilst on his part he carried War into Flanders. But Francis could not resolve to join so openly with England, for fear of offending the Pope. Besides, he turned all his thoughts to the Milanese, where an accident, about the end of the last year, gave him an opportunity to carry his Arms. As this accident was the

(2) All Monasteries, &c. heretofore exempt from the Archbishop's Visitation, were still to be so, and such Abbots whose Elections were formerly confirmed by the Pope, were now to be confirmed by the King. See the Act, being 21 in the Statute-Book, 27 in the Record, and 8 in the Journal.

(3) There were present only the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Bath and Wells, Lancaster, and Carlisle, with twelve Abbots. Burnet, Tom. I. p. 144.

(4) Besides the Acts mentioned above, there were others of some Importance made; namely, 1. That Persons indicted of Petit Treason, wilful Murder, Robbery, or other Felony, and upon their Arraignment standing mute, or peremptorily challenging above twenty of the Jury, or else refusing to answer directly to their Indictments, shall not have the benefit of the Clergy. 2. By another, the delinquent Vice of Sundry was adjudged Felony. 3. There was also an Act made to prevent the destroying of wild Fowl, whereby it was enjoined, that none should be taken from the last Day of May, to the last of August, upon pain of one Year's Imprisonment. 4. Whereas some People had gathered into few Hands, several Farms, and great Plenty of Cattle, particularly Sheep, some to the Number of twenty thousand, whereby the Rents of Lands were not only encreased, but also Tillage very much delayed, some Churches and Towns had been pulled down, and the Price of Corn, Cattle, &c. exceedingly enhanced; it was therefore enacted, that no Man should keep above two thousand Sheep at one time: And not hold above two Farms at once, and stand to be in the Parish where he lives. 5. That no Man should buy bound Books brought from beyond Sea, nor buy any such by retail. See Statute. 25 Hen. VIII.

(5) Gardiner wrote to Cromwell from Winchester the 6th of May, that the Lord Shaugh and others, with all the Abbots, Priors, Wardens, and Corsars within the shire had taken the Oath. The Terms in which they did it are not known, for though they were enrolled, yet in Queen Mary's Days Bonar and others were commissioned to examine the Records, and rare out all things done either in Contempt of the See of Rome, or the Desamiation of Religious Houses. However, two of the Sub priors of Religious Orders, dated May 4, 1534, escaped their Diligence. One is by Abbas, the other by the Parrets and Convent of the Dominican Nuns at Diptford. See Burnet's Collection, No. 50. Vol. I.

(6) At a meeting of the Privy-Council at London, many were cited to take the Oath. More was first called, and the Oath being tendered him, he replied, after having considered the Act, he would neither blame those that made it, nor those that swore the Oath, but for his part, though he was willing to swear to the Succession, if he might be suffered to draw up the Oath himself, yet for the Oath that was offered him, his Conscience forbade him, that he could not, without hazarding his Soul, take it. Upon which, being desired to withdraw, others were called upon, and did all take the Oath except Fisher, who answered in almost the same manner as More had done. Then More was again brought in, and they flew him how many had taken it; he said, He judged no Man for doing it, only he could not do it himself. Being asked the Reason, he replied, He feared it might prove the King the more against him if he should offer Reasons, which would be called disputing against Law: But however, if the King would command him to do it, he would put them in writing. Cromwell urged him with this Argument, that since he blamed not others for taking it, it seemed he was not persuaded it was a Sin, but was doubtful in the matter: But he did know certainly he ought to obey the King as the Law; therefore he was obliged to do that about which he was certain, notwithstanding his Doubts. He answered, though he had examined the matter very carefully, yet his Conscience leaned positively to the other side, and offered to purge himself by Oath that it was purely out of Conscience that he refused it. The Abbot of Wolmynster pressed him (with an Argument too often used in the like cases) that he might see his Conscience was erroneous, since the great Council of the Realm was of another mind. Cromwell in a Letter to Cromwell, earnestly pressed to accept the Oath as Henry and Fisher refused; for if they once swore to the Succession, it would quiet the Kingdom, since all others would acquiesce and submit to the Judgment of the great Council. dinner was thereby enabled to cross, upon other points, the Reformation, who daily gained ground (1).

It was not only in Germany that the Reformation had made some progress, but also in many other places. In England it had been countenanced in some measure by Cardinal Wolsey, as, during his Ministry, no Person was prosecuted for Heresy, though the Clergy wanted not occasions to exercise their usual severities, had they been left to take their own Course. After Wolsey's disgrace, Sir Thomas More being made Chancellor, perfwaded the King, that what did him the most injury at the Court of Rome, was the report of his being a favourer of the Innovators, and to remove this false imputation, the most infallible way was to show a zeal for Religion. Henry following this advice, ordered the Laws against Heretics to be rigorously executed, and very strictly prohibited the importing any of their Books into the Kingdom. But this Prohibition was not capable of hindering several of Luther's Treatises from being brought into England, with Tindal's Translation of the New Testament, who was retired into Flanders. The Bishop of London having notice of it, caused some Copies to be seized, and publicly burnt by the Hangman (2). But this was so far from injuring the Reformation, that it rather turned to its advantage. Many Persons, full of indignation at this impious Act, inferred that the Scriptures were contrary to the Religion generally professed, since the Clergy took such care to hinder the Bible from being read, and that alone raised their desire to read it. On the other hand, the dislike the English had taken to the Pope, greatly increased, by the reading of the Lutheran Writings.

As the Reformation gained ground, the zeal of its enemies was inflamed against such as embraced it. Whilst More was Chancellor, he spared no pains to deftroy them utterly. Many suffered Martyrdom (3) with a wonderful constancy, which very much contributed to strengthen their Brethren. At length, the King having to manage the German Protestants, because he might afterwards want them, suspended More's persecution. On the other hand, Ann Bullen very much mollified the King in that respect. Archbishop Cranmer contributed to it likewise to the utmost of his power, and Thomas Cromwell, now in great esteem with the King, seconded their endeavours as far as in him lay (4). But they had a strong Party against them, consisting of the Duke of Norfolk, Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, Longland Bishop of Lincoln, almost all the Churchmen who had any access to the Court, and those who, when they preached before the King, filled their Sermons with invectives against the Reformation. All these had gained Henry's confidence by their compliance in the affair of the Divorce and the Supremacy, though in the last they acted contrary to their sentiments. By this condescension, they were enabled effectually to oppose the Reformers, in all the Articles which concerned not the Pope, and especially in that of the real Presence, which the King deemed unquestionable, and thought so all his Life. In spite of all this, the Heads of the Reformed depaired not of inclining him by degrees to a farther Reformation, because of the connection, the Articles of Religion have one with another. Besides, their party grew stronger every day, by the junction of such as read the Holy Scriptures and the religious Books which were handed about, notwithstanding the King's Prohibition. Nothing shows more the number and strength of that Party, than the readiness wherewith the Parliament passed the Acts which tended to lessen the Clergy's power, and shake off the papal yoke.

The Reformation made likewise some progress in France : the King himself expressed an inclination for the Doctrine of the Protestants, which was privately countenanced by his Sister Margaret Queen of Navarre. But the Cardinals of Tournon and Lorraine, who were in great credit with him, dissuaded him from it so earnestly, that they gained him at last, nay, made him a violent Persecutor.

Before I close what relates to the events of the year 1534, I must not forget to mention, that a twelve-month's Truce concluded the last year (5) between England and Scotland, was turned into a Peace the 11th of May this year. By the Treaty, the Peace was to last till the death of one of the two Kings, and Henry might, without breaking it, keep the Douglas's in England.

In the beginning of the year 1535, Francis I. sent an Embassy to Henry, under colour of discharging the duty of a good Friend and Ally, but in reality to try to deceive him, by feigning to acquaint him with his secrets, and ask his advice. The occasion of the Embassy was this : The Emperor having resolved to carry his Arms into Africa, had a mind to amuse Francis, least, in his absence, he should attack the Duke of Savoy, and so open a way to the Duchy of Milan, as he seemed to intend. To that purpose, he had dispatched an Ambassador to him, with orders to propose a Marriage between his third Daughter and Philip Prince of Spain ; and another between the Dauphin and Mary Daughter of Henry and Catherine of Arragon. Moreover, he had offered him a Pension of a hundred thousand Crowns for the Duke of Orleans, upon the Duchy of Milan, and the Duchy itself, after the death of Francesco Sforza, who had no Heirs. It was evident, these overtures were designed only to amuse Francis, who considered them himself upon no other foot. Nevertheless, he imagined they would serve to procure him some advantage from Henry, if he let him know he was courted by the Emperor. To this end, he sent into England Admiral Chabot Seigneur de Brion, on pretence to advise with the King upon these offers. But his chief aim was to make him uneasy, and induce him to offer some advantageous proposals. It appeared in the sequel he would have perfwaded him to things which were very far from his thoughts. The Admiral having discharged his Commission, Henry answered, he much wondered, the Emperor should pretend to marry his Daughter, over whom he neither had nor ever should have any right or power : That it was manifest, he only sought to break the Union between France and England, and therefore he hoped the King of France would not be so much his own enemy, as to hearken to such overtures. Shortly after, he sent orders to his Ambassador at Paris (6), to tell Francis, he would give Elizabeth his Daughter and Heir to the Duke of Angoulême his third Son, upon the following conditions : That Francis himself, his three Sons, the Princes of the Blood, the principal Nobility of France, the Parliaments, and Universities should solemnly promise to cause to be revoked the Sentence given against him by the Bishop of Rome : That the Duke of Angoulême should be sent into England to be educated : That in case by his Marriage he should come to the Crown of England, the Duchy of Angoulême should be independent of the Crown of France. These conditions were afterwards mitigated, and Francis I. seemed to agree to them. But he required in his turn, that Henry should assist him in the War of Savoy, and forgive him the perpetual Annuity of a hundred thousand Crowns, which he was bound to pay by a Treaty. Henry perceiving Francis's insincerity, told the Admiral, that instead of forgiving the Pension, he expected, the King his Master should pay the Arrears, and clear by the time appointed, all his other Debts. This answer put an end to the Negotiation, which probably, was undertaken only to found Henry concerning the Pension.

Francis's grand design was to recover the Duchy of Milan, under pretence of revenging the affront done him by Sforza. But, to execute this project, it was necessary to raise the Emperor troubles, which should hinder him from assisting that Duchy. There were four several quarters from whence he hoped to imbroil the Emperor. First, from the Pope and the Princes of Italy. Secondly, in Germany, by means of the League of Smalcald. Thirdly, by fomenting discord between the King of England and the Emperor. Lastly, by drawing the Turks into Germany. In order to all this, he had married his Son the Duke of Orleans to Catherine de Medici ; lodged a hundred thousand Crowns in the hands of the Duke of

(2) Tindal Bishop of London being at Antwerp, (where Tindal was) in 1529, as he returned from his Embassy at the Treaty of Cambray, sent one Paul Scoton an English Merchant, and desired him to see how many of Tindal's New Testaments he might have for Money. Paulington acquaints Tindal with what the Bishop proposed. Tindal was very glad of it, for he was then designing a new and more correct Edition ; but being poor, and the former Impression not being sold off, he could not go about it. So, giving Paulington all the Copies that lay in his hands, the Bishop paid for them, and brought them over and burnt them in Cheshide. Next Year, when the second Edition was finished, many more were brought over, and Chancellor More, requiring of one Copland, who it was that encouraged and supported them at Antwerp, was told, that the greatest Encouragement they had was from the Bishop of London, who had bought up half the old Impression. This made all that heard it laugh heartily. William Tindal born on the Borders of Wales, and brought up at Oxford, was afterwards burnt in 1536 at Fiford, eighteen Miles from Antwerp, crying out at the Stake. guard against the Emperor's attacks, who had openly threatened him. He was sensible, if he were once engaged in a War, those that durst not look him in the face during his prosperity, would not scruple to declare against him, if his Arms were unsuccessful. The King of Scotland his Nephew was the Person most to be feared. As for the King of France, who professed himself his friend, and indeed was much obliged to him, he had shewn too plainly how self-interested his Friendship was, to be relied on. They both intended to imbroil the Emperor, but with different views. Each meant to make his Ally subservient to his designs, and to improve the advantages which flowed from their Union. Thus Henry saw no resource but in his own subjects, among whom however there were many Male-contented. But as he had acted for some time with great haughtiness, he found, if he relaxed on this occasion, it would certainly be ascribed either to his scruples, or to a sense of his weakness, than which nothing could be more prejudicial to him. This consideration, joined to his stern and haughty Temper, rendered him altogether untractable. From thenceforward he became fierce, cruel, inflexible of his People's calamities, and executing without mercy, the Laws dictated by himself to his Parliament. In short, he may, in some manner be said, to be no longer the same King that had before reigned. All that can be alleged in his vindication, is, that he was often provoked by persons, who, endeavouring to alienate the Hearts of his Subjects, attacked him in the most sensible part, because his whole reliance was upon the assistance of his People.

Reason of the great submission of the English to Henry.

It will, doubtless, be surprizing to see in this Reign the English so patient and submissive to their Sovereign's pleasure, that hardly do we find, from the beginning of the affair of the Divorce, that the Parliament refused him any thing, though his demands were very extraordinary. But it is easy to discover the reason. Religion was the sole cause. The King, as it was observed, kept a sort of medium with respect to Religion. But as no Man could believe it possible for him to remain long in that situation, those who desired the Reformation, imagined they could not do better than comply with him in all things, to induce him to advance it by degrees. In like manner, the friends of the old Religion, seeing such beginnings, were afraid he would proceed, and their opposition but make him finish his work the sooner. So, each Party striving to gain him to their interest, there resulted for him an authority which none of his Predecessors had ever enjoyed, and which he could not have usurped in any other circumstances, without hazarding his Crown. But both Parties were alike deceived. Henry kept in the same medium all the rest of his Life, and made them both feel the sad effects of that absolute Power they had so easily suffered him to assume. It is true, he was always so prudent, as not to act contrary to Law. But he made use of his Power to procure such Laws as he pleased, and then executed them without mercy. This will frequently be seen in the sequel. But after showing Henry's Character and Motives, his Actions must be related, which will confirm what has been observed.

The Monks become odious to the King.

Though the Acts concerning the King's Marriage, and the Papal Power, bore the Seal of the public authority, they were very far from being universally approved. As they were not ascribed so much to the two Houses as to the King, on him it was that the whole blame was cast. Among all the Male-contented, the Monks were the most open, by their attempts to blacken him in the minds of the People. They could not bear his setting himself up in the Pope's room, whom they had always considered, and still did consider as their true Head, notwithstanding the Statutes made against him. These were the Men that caused the pretended Kentish Prophecies to say, If the King put away Queen Catherine, and married another, 1535. he should die in a month, and come to a tragical end.

A Franciscan, named Peto, preaching before the King (1), Inf-lence of was so hardy as to tell him to his face; That God's a Franciscan. Judgments were ready to fall upon his head: That he was always surrounded with a crowd of lying Prophets, who fore-Sum. told him good success. But for himself, like another Micaiah, he warned him that the Dogs should lick his blood, as they had done Ahab's. This Frier's insolence, and the daily reports of the Invectives which were every where spread against him, provoked him extremely against them, as well as against those that had the boldness to speak opprobriously of the Acts of Parliament. He was however very patient for some time, imagining that People would at length be calmed: But when he saw they did not cease to asperse him with all sorts of Calumnies, he called a Council to consider how he should behave towards those who affected to contradict the Laws, and speak evil of him. Some of the Council were for taking notice of these offences, for fear too great a Severity should have a quite contrary effect to what he desired (2). But others represented to him the ill consequence of a conduct. They showed him, that these People's aim was to stir up the People against him, to give the Bishop of Rome opportunity to assert his pretended authority, and therefore they were for putting the Laws in execution with the utmost rigor. The King himself was of this opinion, as most agreeable to his fierce and stern Temper, which could not bear contradiction. Besides, he saw to what he should be reduced in the end, if his enemies succeeded in their design to render him odious to the People. It is not therefore very strange, that seeing himself thus provoked, he resolved to treat with rigor People who laboured with all their power to ruin him.

The resolution being taken of executing the Laws without mercy, certain Priors, Monks, and others, who had been too free with the new Statutes, were apprehended, tried, and executed, according to the utmost rigor of the same Laws (3). But at the same time, the King, fearing lest this severity should be ascribed to the inclination, he was charged with, for the new Religion, affected to use the same rigor to those who had openly embraced the Reformation, and put them to death with the others. At last, to keep every one in awe by an example which should make the boldest tremble, he resolved to deliver up to the rigor of the Law, Fisher and More, then Prisoners in the Tower (4). To this end, Fisher was required to take the Oath of Supremacy, it being supposed he would refuse it, as he did indeed. About the same time Paul III. created him Cardinal, though he had declared, that if the Cardinal's Hat was laid at his feet, he would not stoop to take it up. But the Pope, whose aim was to encourage such as opposed the King, conferred however that Dignity upon him, with the pompous Elogy, that he considered him as the Cardinal of Cardinals. This unseasonable honour hastened in all likelihood Fisher's death, who being condemned, was executed the 22d of June, a month after his being made Cardinal, and some days before the Hat, sent him by the Pope, came to London (5). After that, Sir Thomas More being required to take the same Oath, refused to answer, saying, The Act of Parliament is like a Sword with two edges, for if a Man answer one way, it will destroy the Soul, and if he answer another, it will destroy the Body. Upon his refusal, he was condemned and executed. He was a Man of great Learning, and excellent Parts, but so addicted to jesting, that even the presence of death could not make him lay aside his usual facetiousness (6). When upon the point of being executed, he had laid his head on the block to receive the mortal blow, he perceived, his Beard was got under his Chin: Whereupon hastily rising up, he bid the Executioner stay a little till he had put his Beard aside, since

The King bore Peto's Insolence patiently; but, to undeceive the People, procured Dr. Corwin to preach the next Sunday, who justified the King's Proceedings, and condemned Peto, as a Rebel, a Slanderer, a Dog, and a Traitor. Peto was gone to Canterbury, but Elton, another Frier of the same House, interrupted him, and said, he was one of the lying Prophets, that fought by Adultery, to establish the Succession to the Crown. And yet, nothing more was done to these two Friers, than that they were conveyed before the Council, and rebuked for their Insolence. Stow, p. 562. Burnet, Tom. 1. p. 151.

They were all drawn and quartered at Tyburn. The Witcham put to Death, were, John Frith, a Man of great Learning, and Andrew Hewes, on July 23, 1534. (5) Burnet says, the Hat came no never him than Picardy. He was brought to his Trial on the 17th of June. The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Suffolk, and some other Lords, together with the Judges, sat upon him by a Commission of Oyer and Termor. He was beheaded in the eighth Year of his Age, on Stret Hill, and his Head was set up on London Bridge. His Body was first buried in Barnes Church-yard, and afterwards taken up and interred with More's in the Tower. He was many Years Canon of the King's Grammar-school, the Council of Richmond. It was believed, that he persuaded her to found her two Colleges in Cambridge, and upon that account was chosen Chancellor of that University. Henry VIII. gave him the bishoprick of Rockester, which he, following the Rule of the Primitive Church, would never change for a better: He used to say his Church was his Wife, and he had never part with her because she was poor. Burnet, Tom. 1. p. 354.

(6) When he was going up the stairs to the Scaffold, observing they were weak, he tied one of the Sheriff's Officers to give him his Hand to help him up, and said, When I come down again, let me shift for my self, as well as I can. After, when he was first committed to the Tower, one of the Officers, descending, saw a upper Garment (that is his Gown) for his Feet, Sir Thomas taking off his Cap, gave it him, saying, That was the uppermost Garment he had. Hall, fol. 226.

The Emper-

This occasioned an ordinance of the King, who, as supreme head of the Church of England, discharged from their Vows such as were professed under four and twenty years of age, and allowed all the rest to quit their Houses, and live like Seculars if they pleased (1). But as most were accustomed to an idle life, and perceived, when they forsook their Monasteries, they should be forced to work for their livelihood, the liberty given them by the King produced no great effect. Besides, there were doubtless many, who, out of conscience, thought not proper to use it. So, Henry was obliged to take other measures.

It was but this year that Cardinal Campgio lost the Bishoprick of Salisbury, which was given to Nicolas Shaxton a friend to the Reformers. Shortly after, the See of Worcester was taken from Giunici an Italian, and conferred on Hugh Latimer, great friend of Crommer. John Hilsey was promoted to the See of Rochester, vacant by the death of Fisher, and Edward Fox to that of Hereford.

Among all the King's enemies, or enviers, none gave him more uneasiness than his Nephew the King of Scotland, and not without reason. During the whole time of that Prince's minority, Henry had fomented the troubles of Scotland, and even shown that his designs tended to become master of that Kingdom. James was fully informed, and though he showed great regard for the King his Uncle, he let him see however he did not confide in him as a friend. Henry therefore was in danger, that, if the innovations in Religion caused disturbances in the Kingdom, the King of Scotland would take occasion to be revenged, by afflicting the Male-contents. This fear was the more just, as the Emperor knowing the King of Scotland's disposition, had already laboured to inspire him with suspicions and jealousies of France and England. Nay, he would have concluded a League with him, as I observed, had not Francis broken his measures, by procuring a Peace between England and Scotland. But notwithstanding this Peace, Henry was always in distrust of that quarter. So, to make himself easy, he formed the project to infill into the King of Scotland the resolution to follow his example, and renounce the Pope's obedience. He considered this as a sure means to preserve between the two Kingdoms a strict Union, which would be very advantageous in his present circumstances. He sent him therefore in the first place a long Letter (2), declaring the reasons of his conduct with regard to the Pope. Then, he dispatched an Ambassador (3) to propose an interview, fancying that a conference with him would produce a greater effect than whatever he should say to him by Letter or Embassy. But though the Reformation had already crept into Scotland, James had no inclination to embrace it. So, the Ecclesiasticks about his Person easily dissuaded him from accepting the Interview, where they were afraid some things might pass very prejudicial to their Religion. Mean while, James, not being willing openly to refuse the conference desired by the King his Uncle, gave him hopes of his consent, after certain difficulties, purposely raised, were removed. But at the same time he demanded of the Pope a Brief, to forbid his having any Interview with the King of England. When the Brief came, he gave the King his Uncle notice of it, who having prepared for his Journey, was extremely offended at this refusal. Hence sprang a quarrel between them, which I shall have occasion to mention hereafter.

Before I conclude the year 1535, I must not forget to relate an event which very much changed the face of the affairs of Europe. I mean the death of Francesco Sforza Duke of Milan, which happened in the month of October. As this Prince left no issue by Catherine of Denmark the Emperor's Niece, whom he had lately married, the Duchy of Milan as Fief of the Empire, was fallen to the Emperor, to be disposed of as he pleased. So, the fears and jealousies of the Pope, the King of France and the Venetians, were revived on this occasion; each of these Potentates having cause to fear the Emperor would keep Milan for himself, or give it to his Brother the King of the Romans. In that case, Italy would of course fall again into Slavery, and the King of France lose his hopes of recovering that Duchy. To make them easy, the Emperor declared he had no design to keep Milan, but intended to present some Prince with it, who should cause no suspicion to those that were concerned to preserve the Peace of Italy. Afterwards, he wisely made use of it for a lure to amuse the King of France. But in reality he never desired to dispossess himself of it (4).

Queen Catherine ended her days the beginning of the year 1536 (5). Though her virtue had gained her an universal esteem, she died however little lamented by the publick, because the equally embarrassed her friends and enemies. Before she expired, she dictated a very tender Letter to the King, who seemed to be extremely moved with it (6). But, in all appearance, his grief was of no long continuance. He was very fond of her when first married, her mildness and modesty having a greater influence upon him than the could expect from her Beauty, which was not extraordinary. In time, his affection abating, he treated her with indifference, though ever with much civility. At last, after he had resolved to put her away, her obstinate refusal to comply with his Will, made him consider her as an enemy. Accordingly he used her rigorously when the sentence of Divorce was pronounced, even to the not suffering her to keep Servants who treated her as a Queen. At last he publicly forbid to give her that title, though he was forced to connive at her disobedience.

The Parliament meeting the 4th of February, finished the Work begun, by abolishing every thing relating to the Pope's power, not to leave the least pretence to acknowledge his authority. But the King had a further view, namely, to suppress the Monasteries, as well to be revenged of the Monks and prevent their ill designs, as to procure their Estates. In all appearance, the late visitation of the Monasteries had convinced him that the Monks were as unserviceable to Religion, as prejudicial to his affairs in his present circumstances.

As among the Constitutions observed in the Church of England, there were not a few that had a manifest relation to the papal Authority, it was absolutely necessary to annul them and make others, which should have for foundation the King's Supremacy. The Parliament had already passed an Act, empowering the King to nominate thirty-two Commissioners to examine such as were to be abolished. But the King had not hastened this nomination, because by this confusion, his authority was much more extensive. Indeed, the papal power was abolished by Act of Parliament, and yet it still subsisted in the Constitutions, which, not being abrogated, threw the Clergy into great perplexities because they knew not what to do. But this was what the King desired, that the Clergy might be more at his devotion, since he could equally prosecute them as guilty, whether they did or did not observe them. The Parliament taking this contrariety into consideration would have cured it, by confirming the power formerly given the King, to appoint Commissioners to alter these Constitutions. This was a sort of reproach for his negligence in that respect. But he feigned not to mind it, and left the affair in the same State it was (7).

He had another thing in his thoughts which affected him much more, namely, to execute his design upon the Monks. In this Session, he represented to the Parliament, that the great number of Monasteries in the Kingdom were a Burden to the State, and earnestly desired them to remedy the Evil by such means as they should judge proper. Whereupon it was enacted, That all Houses of two hun-

The 8th of May, King Henry commanded all Persons about his Court to cut their Hair short, and to let them an Example, he caused his own to be cut; and likewise began to wear his Beard knotted, and was no more shaved. She also desired he would provide Matches for her Maids, who were but three; and that he would give her Servants one Year's Wages more than was due to them. She was a devout and pious Princess, and led a severe Life. In her Greenness she wrought much with her own Hand, and kept her Women well employed about her, as appeared when the two Legates came once to speak with her. died Pounds a year and under should be lapped, and their effect given to the King (1). Of this sort there were three hundred seventy six, and a revenue of thirty two thousand Pounds a year fell to the Crown, with above a hundred thousand Pounds worth of Plate, Goods, Ornaments of the Churches, and the like. A new Court was erected, called the Court of the Augmentations of the King's Revenue, which was to take Cognizance of all matters concerning this new acquisition (2). The erecting of a Court for so small a revenue, was a clear evidence, the revenues of all the Monasteries in the Kingdom (3).

The Convocation sitting, as usual, at the same time with the Parliament, a motion was made there, that there should be a Translation of the Bible in English, [to be set up in all Churches,] and the same was approved. It must be observed, the King's intent was only to show the People, there was nothing contrary to the Holy Scriptures in what was done against the Pope. But Cranmer, Cromwell, and the rest of the Reformers had much farther views. They hoped, when the Bible was in the hands of the People, they would see their error in many other things which hitherto had been deem'd essential to Religion. But they took care to hide their designs from the King, knowing how contrary they were to his. Henry was absolutely against all reformation of Doctrine, and consequently they were to bring him insensibly and by degrees to what they desired. They partly succeeded, but they fell extremely short of what they had expected at first. However, they thought it very considerable to obtain his consent that it should be moved in the Convocation, to give the People the Bible in English, and to have caus'd the motion to be approved. As there was then no other English Version of the Bible but Tindal's, made at Antwerp without the Publick Authority, the Convocation petitioned the King for a good Translation, which he was pleas'd to take upon himself (4).

Henry having obtained of the Parliament all he desir'd, thought it time to dissolve it, which he did the 14th of April, after having continued it six years. Never had Parliament held so long since the beginning of the Monarchy.

The care Henry took to secure himself from the Cabals of the Monks, and his other domestick Enemies, did not prevent him from thinking of his foreign Affairs, and of means to avoid the Emperor's attacks. Francis was invading Savoy, and it was but too manifest that his intent was to open a passage into the Milanese. But as this was a great undertaking, considering the then situation of France, the Emperor could not believe, he had engag'd in it without being first free of Henry's assistance. Wherefore he resolv'd to use his utmost endeavours to break their Union. From the death of Sforza, he had continued a private negotiation with Francis, to reign the Duchy of Milan to one of his Sons, and acted so artfully, that the Treaty seem'd to be very near a Conclusion. This could not but inspire Henry with jealousy. He plainly saw if the negotiation ended to the King of France's Satisfaction, he would be regardless of his interests. On the other hand, the Emperor no sooner heard of the death of his Aunt Queen Catherine, but he sent and offer'd Henry to renew their Alliance, with a mutual oblivion of all that was pass'd. But lest he should be taken at his word, he requir'd three conditions, which left him the liberty to prolong the affair as much he pleas'd, his aim being only to sow division between Francis and Henry, by making them suspicious of each other. The first of these conditions, was, that Henry should be reconciled to the Pope, to which end he offer'd his mediation. By the second, he demand'd a powerful assistance against the Turks. By the third, that pursuant to their Treaty in 1518, he should join with him in the defense of Milan, against the attacks of the French King. Henry replied, That what had been done against the Pope could not be revoked: That as soon as Christendom should be in peace, he would act against the Infidels, as became a Christian Prince: That he was ready to renew his alliance with the Emperor, provided it was done without prejudice to the King of France his Ally, that being Friend of both, he might be better enabled to labour their reconciliation, if he could not succeed, to assist him that should be unjustly attacked: That as to the rest, he refus'd not to agree with the Emperor, provided he would own, the rupture came from him. The Emperor perceiving Henry was upon his guard, thought not fit to push this affair any farther. Indeed Henry could easily see, his aim was to let him at variance with France, since at the very time these things pass'd, Francis importun'd him the private negotiation, concerning the Duchy of Milan. Moreover he warn'd him, that the Emperor intended to force him to return to the Pope's obedience, and it was only upon that condition he offer'd to resign the Milanese.

All these proceedings of the Emperor convincing Henry that he sought occasion to attack him, he resolv'd to pursue his negotiation with the Protestants of Germany, to make him a diversion in that Country, which should break his measures with regard to England. To this same end, he had sent Edward Fox to them last year. But they would not be his dupes, not imagining, as he would have made them believe, that he was inclin'd to their Faith, whilst he order'd their Brethren to be burnt in England. So, not to be ingag'd by faint hopes to be subservient to his designs at their expence, they deliver'd to his Ambassador the terms on which they were willing to be strictly united with him. The terms were, That he should embrace the Augsburg Confession; and defend it with all his power in a free Council: That he should approve of no place for holding the Council without their consent: That if the Pope call'd a Council at his own pleasure, Henry should join with them in protesting against it: That he should accept the title of Protector of the League: That he should never return to the Pope's obedience: That he should not assist their enemies: That he should find a hundred thousand Crowns for the occasions of the League, and two hundred thousand if the War lasted any time. Lastly, they added, That when he should have declared himself upon these Articles, they would send Ambassadors and agree with him upon the rest.

These proposals threw Henry into some perplexity. He saw, the sole aim of the Protestants was to support their Religion, and that however was the thing which disturb'd him the least. He was by no means satisfied with the Augsburg Confession, and yet he perceiv'd, in case he openly reject'd it, there was no likelihood of his being able to join with the League of Smalcald. On the other hand, it was his interest to continue this Negotiation, as well because the Protestants might be servicable to him, as to keep the Emperor in awe by that consideration. So his interest requir'd that he should favorably hear these propositions. But whilst he resolv'd to infer in his answer something which should afford him occasion to break, if he thought proper. He replied therefore, that he was willing to furnish the sums required, in case a League, of which he would treat with their Ambassadors, should be concluded between him and the Protestants: That though he was sensible to what the title of Protector of the League would expose him, he was content to accept it, provided there were between him and them a conformity of Doctrine, otherwise he could not engage to defend a Faith, of whose truth he was not convinc'd: That therefore he desired them to send Commissioners with powers to mitigate some Articles of the Augsburg Confession, which he could not approve. Moreover as to the Supplies, he requir'd that the engagement should be mutual, whether he or they were attacked. In fine, he demand'd an authentick approbation of his Divorce, and their promise to justify it in a Council. These proposals of both sides were of a nature to keep a Treaty long on foot. But though the Members of the League of Smalcald saw no great likelihood of a strict Union, they appointed however Sturmius, Draco, Bucer, and Melancthon to go and confer with Henry and his Divines. It was especially provided in their instructions, that nothing should be concluded to the prejudice of the Emperor or Empire. This Negotiation was interrupted by the death of Ann Bullen, which happened shortly after, and which very much alter'd the

(1) A Commission was also directed, on 7. Dec. 1535, to the Bishops of Meath and Kildare, to John Allen Master of the Rolls, Grard Almer Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and some others, empowering them to suppress the Monasteries in Ireland. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 12. p. 521.

(2) The Court was to consist of a Chancellor, a Treasurer, an Attorney and Solicitor, ten Auditors, seventeen Receivers, a Clerk, an Usher, and a Messenger. Besides the great ones, the King was to have the Lands of all those Houses that had been dissolved within a Year before this Act.

Henry VIII. Tom. 1. p. 194.

(3) What remarkable Statutes were enacted during this Session, are as follows. 1. Whereas Pirates used to be tried after the Coast of the Coast Laws, it was ordered, That they should be tried in such Places as should be directed by the King's Commission, and by Justice, as Officers at Law. 2. That every Person who built a Ship, shall keep two Mares thirteen Bays high, for breeding Exile. 3. That Clerks present'd in Burgess, shall not pay Tithes the first Year in which they pay their First-Fruits. 4. That Tithes, Offerings, and other Duties, shall be paid according to the Ecclesiastical Laws and Ordinances of the Church of England, and after the laudable Uses and Customs of each Parish. 5. That all Bargains and Sales of Lands shall be made by Writing indented, sealed, and enrolled, in one of the King's Courts of Record at Westminster, or before the Chief Justices, two Justices, and Clerk of the Peace, of the County where the Lands lie. See Statut. 27 Hen.

For the Account of their Things has not been preserved, nor entered to us with that Care that the Importance of the Thing requir'd. Yet it appears that the Work was carried on at a good rate: For three Years after this it was printed at Paris, which shows they made all convenient haste, in a Thing that required so much Deliberation. Barnet, Tom. 1. p. 196.

face of affairs as well as the King's mind, in respect to the Reformation which the openly countenanced.

The King was possessed at the same time with two passions; a violent love for Jane Seymour, Maid of Honour to the Queen (1), and an extreme jealousy of his Wife (2). Very likely, the latter was a consequence of the former. When Ann Bullen's enemies found, she no longer held in the King's heart the place she had formerly enjoyed, instead of fearing to accuse her of unfaithfulness to the King her Spouse, they believed they should please that Spouse, who began to be himself unfaithful. It is certain the King had lost that affection for the Queen, which made him surmount so many obstacles to possess her; whether enjoyment had quenched this first flame, or the Queen's indifferences given the King cause to suspect her, he gave himself over to jealousy, that it was not in his power to overcome it, or perhaps he never much endeavoured it. However this be, the occasion was this. The Queen had a great friendship for her Brother the Lord Rochford, but could not endure his Wife, who lived very ill with her Husband, and had an infamous character, as will evidently appear hereafter. It was this Lady that whispered in the King's ear the first report that the Queen was unfaithful, and had a criminal Commerce with her Brother the Lord Rochford. These feeds fell upon a Soil already prepared to receive them. The King, now prejudiced by his passion for Jane Seymour, was overjoyed to find in the pretended unfaithfulness of the Queen, a means to procure the possession of the Person he loved. As soon as Queen Ann's enemies saw how the King took affected towards her, they took care to ruin her quite in his favor, by accusing her of sundry intrigues with her own Domesticks. These enemies were the same with those of the Reformation. They imagined, she had put the King upon all his proceedings against the Pope, on purpose to favor the new Religion. But though she had not done this, it was sufficient to hate her that she had been the cause, by inspiring the King with love, since that had occasioned Catherine's Divorce, and consequently all the innovations in Religion. Policy might likewise enter into their project. They were sensible, so long as Ann lived she would be an invincible obstacle to a reconciliation with Rome, whereas if she were dead, they hoped, all difficulties would be easily removed. The Duke of Norfolk inwardly burned with a desire to see Religion again established upon the same foot it was before these alterations, though, like a good Courtier, he took care not to discover it to his Master. So, it is commonly believed, this Lord contributed most to the Queen's ruin, because among all her enemies, he had most access to the King. But however, whether it was he or another, the King was inspired with a jealousy which threw him into a sort of fury. This is not very strange, considering his temper, the most impetuous and most impatient that ever was. The Queen was accused of a Criminal Commerce, not only with the Lord Rochford her Brother, but also with Henry Norris [Groom of the Stole,] Francis Wynton and William Brereton [of the King's Privy Chamber,] and one Mark Smeton [a Musician.] It must be confessed, the Queen had some indiscreet ways, which the King never minded, whilst he was not prejudiced against her, but which afterwards were too capable of confirming his suspicions (3). Besides, as soon as he hearkened to what was said against her, probably, her enemies were very diligent to give an ill turn to her most innocent words or actions. Without doubt, Henry was some time tormented with jealousy before he discovered it, but at last it broke out at a solemn justice held at Greenwich (4), from whence he suddenly withdrew with signs of great anger, the cause whereof could not be guessed. It is likely, he had observed something that confirmed his suspicions, of which none but himself took notice. Sanders says, the Queen dropping her Handkerchief, one of her Gallants took it up and wiped his Face with it. But this Author is the only Person that relates this circumstance (5). However this be, the King was no sooner gone from the Justice, but he ordered the Lord Rochford, Norris, Wynton, Brereton and Smeton to be arrested. At the same time the Queen was confined to her Chamber, and next day conveyed to the Tower (6). But what plainly showed the design of her enemies to deface her, was their procuring an order for the Archbishop of Canterbury to retire to his Palace at Lambeth, for fear if he could speak with the King, he would find occasion to vindicate the Queen.

It is not surprising, this Princess in her sad condition should be disordered, and having none to advise with, should be inflamed by her enemies. Her Uncle's Lady, the Lady Bullen was appointed to lie in her Chamber, with whom she was at great variance, and from this Lady, who was placed there to watch her, it came to be known, that during her confinement, she said some things which helped to confirm the King's suspicions. However, upon her examination, she positively denied, she had ever been false to the King. Only when she was told that Norris, Wynton, Brereton and Smeton had accused her, though she might have easily seen it was purely to draw from her some confession, she believed she ought not to conceal certain things which had passed between her and them. She said concerning Norris, that asking him one day why he did not go on with his Marriage, he replied, there was no hope. Whereupon she said, the plainly saw he was in hopes of having her, in case the King died. This seems to argue there was some familiarity between her and Norris. Otherwise, supposing the truth of the fact, it is hard to conceive that a Queen should think of talking thus to one of her Domesticks.

As for Smeton the Musician, she said, he was never in her Chamber but twice. That the last time she saw him there, she asked him why he was so sad; and that in her conversation with him he had the boldness to tell her, No, no, Madam, a Look suffices me (7).

As for Wynton, the owned he had taken the liberty to tell her, he loved her, and that she thereupon defied him (8).

But after all, the question is to know, whether the registers from whence this examination is taken are true, or whether the examination was impartially written. Indeed, this doubt alone is not sufficient to clear the Queen. But then, when it is considered, she had for adversary a Husband who was King, and jealous even to madness, very likely, they who were employed to examine her, gave her words such a turn and sense, as favoured the King's designs, by pretending to set down the substance of her answers instead of her very words.

As for the Lord Rochford, all the evidence for his pretended familiarity with the Queen his Sister, amounted to no more than that he was once seen leaning on her Bed.

When these Men were examined, Norris swore he believed the Queen innocent, and persisted in his affirmation to his last breath. Smeton confessed, he had known the Queen carnally three times; but he was never con-

(5) Burnet, who was at more than ordinary Pains to learn all he could concerning this Affair, observes, that this Circumstance is not in Spelman, a Judge at that time, who wrote an account of the Matter with his own Hand, in his Common-place Book, of which Burnet had a Sight. Spelman says, the Business was discovered in a very different manner. As for the Evidence (says he) of this Matter, it was answered by the Lady Wingham, who had been a Servant to the Queen, and having on a sudden informed some time before her Death, did swear this Matter to one of her ... Are here unlikeliest the rest of the Page is torn off. By this it seems there was no legal Evidence against the Queen, and that it was a Woman at second hand who deposed what they heard the Lady Wingham swear. Who this Person was we know not, nor in what Temper of Mind the Lady Wingham might be when she swore. And this it seems was that which was brought to the King at Greenwich during the Justice, who did thereupon immediately return to Whitehall. Burnet, Tom. 1. p. 197.

(6) Sir Thomas Audley Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Cromwell the Secretary, and Sir William Knollys Countess of the Tower, who were sent to apprehend her, letting her know, what Crime she was charged with, the cried out, That she was wronged, and desired to see the King before she was conveyed to the Tower, but in vain. When she was brought to the Tower, she fell on her knees before the same Lords, beseeching God to help her, as she was not guilty of that whereof she was accused, and desired those Lords to defend the King's grace to be good unto her. Stow, p. 572. Herbert, p. 194.

(7) She said, "Smeton was never in her Chamber but when the King was left at Winchester; and then he came to play on the Virginals: She said, "She never spoke to him after that but on Saturday before May day, when she saw him standing in the Window; and then she asked him, "why he was so sad? He said, it was no matter. She answered, You must not expect I should speak to you as if you were a Nobleman, since you are an inferior Person. No, no, Madam, said he, a Look suffices me." Burnet, Tom. 1. p. 199.

(8) She seemed more apprehensive of Wynton than of any body. For on Whitsun Monday last he said to her, "That Norris came more to her Chamber upon her account, than for any body else that was there. She had observed that he loved a Kinswoman of hers, and challenged him for it, and she was not loving his Wife. But he answered her, That there were Women in the House whom he loved better than them both: She asked, Who is that? Your self, said he; upon which, she said, she desired him." Ibid.

fronted with her; nay, he was condemned before she was brought to her Trial, that he might not be a witness. This makes very much for the Queen, since it is not likely such an evidence would have been voluntarily neglected, had it been deemed as good as it appears to be. But probably it was feared that Stanton would retract or the Queen confound him, if brought face to face with her. The rest pleaded not Guilty; but however were condemned and executed (1).

Three days after, the Queen and the Lord Rochford her Brother were tried by their Peers (2), the Duke of Norfolk being Lord High-Steward for that occasion (3). The Queen was accused of prostituting herself to her Brother and four other Men, and conspiring the King's death. But this last Charge being without any foundation, it was not thought proper to insist upon it. The Queen and the Lord Rochford pleaded Not Guilty, and yet were condemned without its being ever known upon what evidence the Sentence was grounded. Judgment was given, that the Lord Rochford should be beheaded and quartered. As for the Queen, she was condemned to be burnt or beheaded at the King's pleasure.

Very probably, the King believed the Queen guilty, and under his present prejudice, signs and tokens were said to him as good proofs. But can the same thing be said to the Peers who condemned her? Did their Conscience suffer them to condemn a Queen to death upon bare surmises? I say surmises, since had there been solid proofs, they would very likely have been published, in order to justify a Sentence of this nature, which was unprecedented in England. Such reserve was not afterwards used with respect to another of Henry's Queens, who was really guilty of the like Crime. All that can be said in favour of those who passed sentence on Ann Bullen is, that their dread of turning against themselves the King's fury, if they complied not with his humour, made them consider signs as real proofs. It is observable, there were but twenty-six Peers present at the Trial, though there were then fifty-three in England, as appears by the Summons to Parliament directed to them shortly after. This gives occasion to conjecture, that according to the method introduced by Cardinal Wolsey, in the condemnation of the Duke of Buckingham, care was taken to remove those, who were suspected not to have so much complaisance as to gratify the King's passion at the expence of their Conscience. As for Dr. Burnet's saying in his History, that Ann Bullen's Father was among her Judges, it is known he retracted it afterwards.

The Sentence was executed the 19th of May. Ann suffered death with great constancy, after a short Speech to those that were present, wherein she neither confessed nor denied the Crime for which she was condemned. She contented herself with acknowledging her obligations to the King, with praying for him, and desiring the Prayers of the People for herself (4). It is generally believed, her fear of drawing the King's anger on her Daughter Elizabeth, prevented her from insisting upon her own innocence (5). As she knew the King's temper perfectly, and could not vindicate herself without charging him with injustice, she was afraid Elizabeth would become the sacrifice of the King her Father's Repentment. However, this was the tragical end of Ann Bullen, whom some have vehemently defamed, and whose conduct others have as carefully justified, without any possibility yet of knowing for certain whether she was guilty or innocent. The enemies to her Daughter Elizabeth and the Reformation, have blackened her Reputation as much as possible, imagining thereby to give a mortal wound to the Protestant Religion. For a contrary reason, the Protestants have forgot nothing that could conduce to give her a quite different Idea. But both have reason'd upon a false Principle, since the goodness of a Religion depends not upon the life and conversation of the Professors. For my part, if I may speak my opinion, I can never believe, the Peers, her Judges, had sufficient evidence to condemn her as guilty of defiling the King's Bed. However, it cannot be denied that by some Familiarities unbecoming a Queen, she gave too great an advantage over her. As she was young and handsome, without doubt she was not displeased to see the effect of her Beauty upon all sorts of People, imagining that the Love she inspir'd them with, greatly heighten'd her merit. We see too many Ladies liable to this infirmity. Be this as it will, it is certain, the Spirit of Party has not a little contributed to the diversity of opinions concerning the Queen. Had the not contented the reformation, the would have undoubtedly fewer Accusers among the Catholics, and had she led the King to persecute the Reformed, not many of these would undertake her vindication. This is the way of the World. People are innocent or guilty according to the Party they are of. But besides this general cause, a particular reason may also be found in the carriage of Ann Bullen. She was of a very gay temper, which had charmed the King, but which, after some years of enjoyment, served only to raise his jealousy. On the other hand, it cannot be denied she had very good qualities, and particularly great Charity to the Poor, to whom a few days before her disgrace she had given two thousand Pounds (6). A circumstance in the story of her death shows likewise, she had a very tender Conscience. After she was condemned, she fell upon her knees to the Lady Bullen her Sister-in-law (7), and conjured her for God's sake, to tell the Princess Mary, the begged her pardon for her ill usage of her. This Charity, and this tenderness of Conscience would little become a Woman, who should have had a shameful and criminal commerce with four Men and her own Brother. But they would be very consistent with great indifferency and a little coquetry.

Tho' the King had procured the Queen's condemnation, he was not satisfied. He was pleased to give her, before she died, a fresh cause of mortification, by annulling their marriage. To this end, he caused her to be turned to many ways, that at last she confess'd a contract between her and the Lord Percy, now Earl of Northumberland, tho' that Lord protested upon his Salvation, there never was any formal promise of Marriage between them. It was

(1) Their Trial came on the 12th of May, on which day they were tried by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer in Westminster-Hall. They were twice indicted, and the Indictments were read by two Grand Jurors in the Counties of Kent and Middlesex. The Crimes they were charged with being said to be done in both Counties. All protested their Innocency, only Stanton confessed, he had well deserved death, which gave occasion to many Reflections. They were all beheld but Stanton, who was hanged. It was generally said, he was bribed into that Confession, and had his life promised; but it was not fit to tell him live to tell tales. Burnet had been much in the King's favour, who lent for him, and offered him his life if he would confess his Guilt. He generously rejected the Offer, affirming, That in his Conscience he thought the Queen innocent, and that he would die a thousand times rather than ruin an innocent Person. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 201. The Charge ran, That he had procured her Brother, and the other four to be with her, and to say and do such things, that he had paid to them, that the King never had her heart; and had said to every one of them by themselves, that for such time as they should say they were his, he would be their Master of the House of the House that was between the King and her. And this was Treason according to the Statute made in the 25th year of this Reign (so that the Law made it her and her life, is now made use of to destroy her.) It was said in the Indictment, that she and her Complexion, had beguiled the King's doubt; but this it seems was only put in to swell the Charge. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 201, 107.

(4) Her Carriage the day she died will best appear from the following original Letter of Sir William Kingston Confable of the Tower to Creswell.

"T H E shall be to advertise you, that I have received your Letter, wherein you would have Strangers conveyed out of the Tower; and so they be, by the means of Richard Greyham, and William Lake, and Whitstable. But the number of Strangers put not thirty, and not in my house. [other.] And the Ambassador of the Emperor had a Servant there, and none of my house. Sir, I have not an Hour certainly, as it may be known a London, I think here will be put in, and I think a reasonable number were better, for I suppose the will secure himself to be a good Woman for all Men but for the King, at the Heart of her death. For that morning she said to me, that I might be with her at such time as the received the Lord to the infant I should hear her speak as touching her Innocency always to be clear. And in the writing of this the first of the time, and as I come the first Mr. Kingston, I hear I shall not die the next noon, and I am very sorry therefore, for I thought to be dead by that time, and put my pain. I told her, it should be no pain, it was to little. And then she said, I heard by the Executioner was very good, and I have a little more, and put her hand about it, laughing heartily. I have seen many Men and also Women executed, and that I have been in great sorrow, and to my knowledge this Lady has much joy and pleasure in death. Sir, her Almshouse I sent ready with her, and had her five hundred a clock after midnight. This is the effect of any thing that is here at this time, and thus fare you well."

She was beheaded a little before noon, on the Green within the Tower. There were present the Dukes of Suffolk and Bedford, the Lord Chamberlain, and Secretary Creswell, with the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs and Aldermen of London. Her head was cut off by Thomas, a Frenchman, as being more expert at his business than any in England: Her Eyes and Lips were ordered to move, after her head was cut off, as if from within, her body was thrown into a common Chelf of Elm that was made to put Arrows in, and was buried in the Chelf with her. Creswell, Vol. I. p. 199.

(5) On the 6th of May she writ a very moving Letter to the King, wherein she insisted upon her Innocency to the strongest terms. And at the same time, affirmed, she could never move from her already chosen. See Herbert, p. 194. Stow's Annals, Vol. I. p. 203. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 201.
(6) She had disposed in the last nine Months of her Life, between London and fifteen thousand Pounds to the Poor. And in all proceedings, the said Lady, the Money that was raised by the Suppression of Religious Houses, had been better employed than it was. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 199.

1536. believed this confession was drawn from her, by an intimation that the King would, on no other condition, be prevailed with to mitigate that cruel part of her Sentence of being burnt, into the milder part of being beheaded. However this be, upon this same Confession, the Archbishop of Canterbury was forced to pass a Sentence of divorce between the King and her (1), and declare their Daughter Elizabeth illegitimate. What is most strange in the King's proceedings, is, the artifice he used, in causing the Queen to be condemn'd before her Marriage was null'd. Had the Sentence of divorce been pass'd before the trial, she could not have been condemn'd for Adultery, since her marriage with the King must have been considered only as a Concubinage. But Henry had acquired such an absolute sway over his Subjects, that his Will was the sole measure of Justice and Law. Nay, he so little regarded the Publick and his own reputation, that he married Jane Seymour the next day after Ann Bullen's death, wherein he express'd a Passion which served greatly to justify the deceased Queen.

The Princess Mary reconciled to the King.

Burnet.

The Death of Ann Bullen revived the hopes of Mary the King's Daughter by his first Wife Catherine. Her Attachment to the Queen her Mother, and her obstinate refusal to submit to the late Acts of Parliament, had quite thrown her out of the King's Favour, who could not bear contradiction. But the late event causing the Friends of Rome to imagine the King might be reconciled to the Pope, they advis'd Mary to accommodate herself to the times, for fear of losing the fruit, this change might produce. As there was nothing now that obstructed the union of the King with the Emperor, it was hoped the Act which declared her Illegitimate might be repealed, provided she made her Submission to the King her Father. To this end, she resolv'd to write a very humble and respectful Letter to the King, protesting, for the future she would have no other Sentiments but His. But Henry not satisfied with a Submission express'd in such general terms, insisted before he restor'd her to favour, upon her signing certain Articles which he had hitherto reject'd: namely, the Supremacy, the renunciation of the Bishop of Rome, and the unlawfulness of her Mother's marriage. Mary tried all possible ways to be excus'd. But at length, finding the King remained inflexible, she sign'd them, though contrary to her opinion, in hopes that the Ill she committed in acting against her Conscience, might be productive of much Good (2). As for the Princess Elizabeth, then about three years old, she was divested of the Title of Princess of Wales, which she had enjoy'd from her Birth. However, the King still continued to educate her at Court with all the Care and Tenderness of a Father.

Parliament.
A new Act of Succession.
Hall.
Herbert.
Stow.
Burnet.

A new Parliament meeting the 8th of June (3), an Act was pass'd to settle the Succession. That made, after their marriage being void by the Sentence of Divorce between the King and Ann Bullen. By this new Act the other was repealed, and the Issue of the King's two first marriages declared illegitimate, and disabled from ever inheriting the Crown. Moreover the Act confirm'd Ann Bullen's Sentence as being ground'd upon very just causes (4), and settl'd the Crown after the King's Death upon the Issue of Queen Jane, or of any other Queen whom he might afterwards marry. Finally they gave the King full Power to declare the Succession to the Crown, either by his Letters Patents under the Great Seal, or by his last Will sign'd with his hand; and if any so design'd to succeed in default of others, should endeavour to usurp upon those before them, or to exclude them, they were declared Traitors, as were also those who should maintain the lawfulness of the former marriages. Hence it may be easily guess'd, with what an absolute sway Henry then ruled, since, without any examination, the Parliament approv'd of all his Actions, and granted him even more than he desired, by giving him power to settle the order of his Successors. By that it was in the King's power to replace Mary and Elizabeth in such order as he pleas'd, or exclude them entirely. This is a clear evidence, that the Parliament had not justice and equity so much in view as pleasing the King.

The Pope tries to make up matters with Henry.
Hall.

Burnet.

When Pope Paul III heard of Ann Bullen's death, he entertain'd hopes of a revocation of what had been done in England. And therefore declared his thoughts to Sir

Gregory Caffali formerly the King's Ambassador, and after some excuses concerning the Sentence of Excommunication which he had given, but was not yet published, told him he would willingly clofe with any expedients that should be deem'd proper to procure a good agreement between the King and him. But Henry, who, some few years before would have done much to obtain the Pope's favour, was now of another mind. Nothing was capable of inducing him to dispossess himself of the authority acquired over the Clergy, as well as over the rest of his Subjects, and which rendered his power more extensive than he expect'd at first. On the contrary, entirely to destroy the Pope's expectations, he caus'd the Parliament to confirm by two new Acts whatever had been done against him. By the first, all persons were to incur the pains of a Premunire, who endeavour'd to restore in England the authority of the Bishop of Rome; and all Officers both Civil and Ecclesiastical were command'd, under severe Penalties, to punish those who should dare to violate this Statute. The second null'd and abolish'd all dispensations, immunities and privileges flowing from the Court of Rome, saving to the Archbishop of Canterbury the power of confirming what should not be contrary to the Law of God, or common decency, [which confirmation was to pass under the Great Seal.]

In this Section two considerable Acts were also pass'd, but which related not to Religion. By the first, it was forbid, under severe Penalties, to marry in the next degrees of the Blood-Royal, without the King's licence first had. This Statute was made on account of Thomas Howard the Duke of Norfolk's Brother, to whom Margaret Douglas the King's Niece [and Daughter to the Queen of Scotland, then living in the English Court] had plighted her faith, without acquainting the King her Uncle. Henry offend'd at their boldness, sent them both to the Tower, and to prevent the like for the future, procur'd the forementioned Act. By the second it was provided, that all usurpations of the Parliament upon the Royal Authority, before the King was twenty four years of age, might be repealed by Letters Patents under the Great Seal. Thus Statute both Houses of Parliament employ'd their whole Authority to give the Sovereign a power which his Predecessors had never enjoy'd, as if they had been alibi for that purpose.

But it was not only with respect to the Civil Government, that the bounds of the Royal Authority were enlarged. The Clergy, unwilling to yield to the Parliament in that point, us'd the same endeavours to become agreeable to the King, by approving all his proceedings. The Convocation being met at the same time, confirm'd the Sentence of the invalidity of the King's marriage with Ann Bullen, upon the same ground which had serv'd to procure it, namely, a Pre-Contract with the Lord Percy, though that Lord deny'd it upon Oath.

A few days after, the lower House of Convocation sent to the upper House sixty seven opinions, which they thought worthy to be condemn'd. At the same time the Deputies made great Complaints against those who were for making innovations in religion. These Complaints were levelled at Cranmer, Cromwell, Shaxton, Latimer, and some others who were noted as Heads or Promoters of the Reformation, though they were not nam'd (5). Care was taken to mix with these sixty seven opinions, mostly drawn from the doctrine of the Lutherans, several Tenets of the old Lollards and the Anabaptists, to insinuate that those who were complain'd of, embrac'd them all alike. The Enemies of the Reformers hoped to make them forfeit the King's favour, who affect'd a great rigour against such as were term'd Heretics. After the death of Ann Bullen they scarce doubted that all whom she had lov'd or protect'd, would share in her ruin. But they were disappointed in their expectations. Cranmer and Cromwell were never more in the King's favour, who even gave preferment after to Cromwell a fresh mark of his esteem, by constituting him his Vice gerent in all Ecclesiastical matters (6). So, the Convocation's complaints, instead of being prejudicial to the Reformation, or Reformers, seem rather to have increas'd the credit of the two Heads. This was quickly perceiv'd, when it was seen that they had published afterwards by the King's order (5). Their publication occasioned great civility or Contests. These that desired a Reformation had gained time, and, in respect to Injures and Purgatory, but especially in that the Scriptures were made the standard of Faith.

from that Principle to draw one day very great consequences. But the determinations concerning the Articles Confession, and the real Presence of Christ, Brought the Presbyterians, tooled them extremely. And now were these Articles directly contrary to their sentiments, but they saw how difficult it would be to meddle with them again, by reason of the King's precedents, who believed it unquestionable. And the other Party was under an insupportable consideration, to see the Articles being long since determined, and the excellence of Papal authority abolished, and the excellent Constitutions placed in question. Thus the Reformers had acted too faintly, in not advancing the Reformation, and could not forbear blaming their compliance, in suffering Doctrines so repugnant to truth, to be established. But it was replied, that every thing could not be done at once, and that it would have been imprudent obstinately to repulse that the errors, the People were not yet sensible of, should be suddenly rectified. The other Party were very angry also with the Bishops, for so freely abandoning Tracts, embraced for so many ages by the Catholic Church. But indeed, it was not in the power of either to act otherwise. The King himself managed the whole, having settled in his Cabinet-Council what he thought fit to alter or keep. But there was not any in this Council that dared to oppose his opinion, or believed it prudent to combat his sentiments, or to fear a too great opposition should produce a quite contrary effect. All that could be done, was to try to enlighten the King gently and insensibly, without stirring him, by a sort of compulsion, to what was thought reasonable.

Before the Convocation broke up, the King communicated to both Houses a Summons, he had received to a Council, which was to meet at Mantua. The Pope, without consulting him, had called this Council in consult with the Emperor, and was to preside by his Legate.
So Henry might well expect to lose his Cause before such a Council, had he been so unwise as to submit to its decisions. Indeed he had appealed from the Pope to a General Council; but there were many Queries to be resolved, in order to know whether this called at Mantua was lawful, and fortified with a sufficient authority. Mean while, before he answered the Summons, he was pleased to advise with the Clergy, who, after mature deliberation, presented to him a writing to this effect:
That a true and lawful General Council was a very good means to preserve the peace and union of the Church; but before a Council was called, it was necessary to consider, First, who had authority to call it: Secondly, Whether the reasons for calling it were weighty. Thirdly, Who should assist as Judges. Fourthly, What should be the order of proceeding. Fifthly, What Doctrines were to be discussed. Then, it was declared that neither the Pope nor any Prince in the World had power to call a General Council, without the consent of all the Sovereigns of Christendom. Pursuant to this Declaration, Henry published a protestation against the Council which was to meet at Mantua, speaking very plainly and freely of the designs and conduct of the Pope. He concluded with saying, that he could not consider as Free and General, a Council where the Bishop of Rome might preside, which should meet in a suspected place, and which must be composed only of a small number of Prelates, till the War between the Emperor and France was ended.

The eighteenth of July, the Parliament was prorogued, after a Session but of forty days, wherein however several Acts of moment were passed (6).

At this time Cardinal Pole was in high repute for his learning and Eloquence. His name was de la Pole, but every where, except in England, he is so well known by the name of Pole, that he cannot be called by any other name without danger of confounding the Reader. He was descended of Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, and Favourite

These Constitutions being presented to the King, who corrected them in several places (4), were signed by Cromwell, Cranmer, seventeen Bishops, forty Abbots and Priors, and fifty Archdeacons and Proctors of the lower House of Convocation, among whom was Polydore Virgil (Archdeacon of Wells,) Author of a History of England,

1536. of Richard II. From that time, this Family had been continually advanced, so that in the Reign of Henry VI, the Earl of Suffolk was honored with the title of Duke. After that, a Lord of this same Family married a Daughter of the Duke of Clarence, Brother of Edward IV. Of this marriage was born, among other Children, Reginald de la Pole, or Polus, the Cardinal I am speaking of, who consequently was Cousin to the King (1). Being a younger Brother, he was designed for the Church, for which also his natural qualities rendered him very proper. In his younger years, he made so great progress in all the Sciences, that the King intending to raise him to the highest dignities of the Church, conferred on him the Deanery of Exeter, with several other Benefices, that he might go and finish his studies abroad. He went first to Paris, where he stayed some years, and forfeited in some measure the King's favour, for refusing to concur with his Agents, in procuring the determinations of the French Universities in the affair of the Divorce. Notwithstanding this, he returned into England, where he assisted as Dean of Exeter, at the Convocation, which acknowledged the King supreme Head of the Church of England (2). There is even reason to presume he was not of the number of those who opposed this new Title, because he kept his Deanery several years after. At length he travelled into Italy, and lived some time at Padua, where he contracted a friendship with Bembo, Sadoletti, and other celebrated Wits. The reputation he acquired in that Country, made the King desirous to recall him, intending to reward his merit, which was universally known. But Pole still declined, on some pretence or other to comply with the King's desire. At last, finding delays could prevail no longer, he was forced to write to the King the true reason of his refusal, which was, he could not approve either of his Divorce, or separation from the Apostolick See. Henry, who was extremely desirous to gain him, sent him a writing, containing his apology, and the reasons of his proceedings against the Pope (3). Upon which Pole wrote his Book De Unitate Ecclesiastica, wherein he takes the liberty to speak of the King in very offensive terms, comparing him to Nebuchadnezzar, and exhorting the Emperor and the rest of the Princes to turn their Arms against him. He was not satisfied with sending him his Book in Manuscript, but caused it to be printed and published (4). Henry provoked, as may be easily judged, at such a violent and disrespectful Behaviour, tried to allure him into England, by writing to him how much he esteemed his Book, desiring him thither to come and explain some difficult passages by word of mouth. Pole took care not to be thus insnared. So the King perceiving this artifice took not effect, diverted him of all his dignities, the loss whereof was amply repaired by the Pope and the Emperor. Some time after, he was rewarded with a Cardinal's Hat. He thereby became still more attached to the Pope's interest, and a greater enemy to the King, who not being able to reach his Person, made his Family and Kindred feel the effects of his indignation.

The suppression of the lesser Monasteries, enacted in the last Session of the late Parliament, was not executed till August, though the Commissioners appointed for that purpose had received their instructions in April. Probably, the King had a mind to see the Issue of the new Parliament before they proceeded. As their report was suppressed in the Reign of Queen Mary, it cannot positively be said what it contained. Thus much is certain, the adherents of the Pope and the old Religion accused them of committing numberless extortions and robberies, and of making false reports of what they discovered in this Visitation, to lessen the horror of their oppressions. This may be partly true. Nay, it is not unlikely that these Men, either from a desire to make their court to the King, or from a greediness to enrich themselves, exceeded their instructions. On the other hand, it is also probable, their accusers highly aggravated the crimes laid to their charge. However this be, immense numbers were extremely displeased at the suppression of so many religious Houses, which were had in great veneration. All the Friars of these suppressed Houses who wished to become Seculars, had a dispensation from the King, and the rest were removed to the larger Monasteries, which were untouched. The Churches and Cloysters were pulled down, and the materials sold to the King's use.

It may be easily judged, the Monks spared no pains to excite the People to rebel. They found it the more easy, as great discontent reigned every where. The nobility and gentry took it very ill, that the King should have the Lands of the suppressed Monasteries, most part whereof were founded by their Ancestors. Besides, they were deprived of the convenience of providing for their younger Children, when they had too many, and of lodging, as they travelled, in these Houses, where they were always well entertained. The poor murmured still louder, because multitudes lived by the Alms which were daily distributed in these Houses. In short, the devout Bigots thought the Souls of their Ancestors must now lie in Purgatory, since so many Masses which were said for their deliverance, were abolished by the suppression of the Monasteries.

The Court hearing of these murmurs, endeavoured to compose them, by publishing the disorders, discovered in these Houses. But this signified nothing. Besides that these reports were deemed very much aggravated, it was said, why were not these abuses severely punished and reformed, without destroying whole Houses for ever? At last, Cromwell found an expedient to allay these contentions in great measure, by advising the King to sell the Lands of the suppressed Monasteries at very easy rates, and oblige the Purchasers, under severe penalties, to keep up the wonted Hospitality (5). But this expedient was not capable of entirely appeasing the murmurs of the People, though the King strove to give them some satisfaction by re-endowing one and thirty of these Houses (6).

Whilst People were in this fermentation, the King published, in the name of the Vice-gerent, some Injunctions to regulate the behavior of Persons in Holy Orders, many of whom led very irregular Lives. These Injunctions contained nothing but what had been ordained by several Synods (7), and yet the Clergy were extremely offended, because they could not endure to see themselves subject to the orders of the Vice-gerent, by whom, they said, they were going to be inflamed much more than by the Pope. Thus the inferior Clergy, the Monks and the Bigots being equally concerned in what had been done, and in what, very probably, was intended to be done, inspired those on whom they had any influence, with a spirit of Rebellion, which quickly broke out into a flame.

The first rising was in Lincolnshire (8), where Dr. Mac-kel, Prior of Barlings, drew after him a great body of Men, whom he headed under the name of Captain Cawler. The Rebels sent their grievances to the King in a very humble manner, telling him, they acknowledged his Supremacy, and were content he should enjoy the Tenth's and First-Fruits of the Livings, but withal prayed him to advise with his Nobility concerning the redress of their Grievances. This was taxing the King indirectly with

(1) This is one of the greatest Mistakes concerning Families Rapin has been guilty of. Cardinal Pole was no ways related to de la Pole Duke of Suffolk. Th. (5) The Purchasers being obliged to keep up the old Hospitality, (which they were to do upon the Penalty of paying every Month six Pounds thirteen Shillings and four Pence, to be levied by the Justice of the Peace, who were empowered to enquire of the Matter) the common sort, who, like those of old, that followed Christ for the Leaves, were much concerned for the loss of a Dinner on Sundays and Holydays, were in a great measure satisfied; and the Gentry, by having good Burgages, were drawn in to like what was done, and to assist the Crown for ever in the Defence of their Laws, their own Interests being interested with the Rights of the Crown. The Commissioners, as was but just, paid all the Debts of the suppressed Monasteries: But when Relicks happened to be pawned, it seems they refused to redeem them. Thus one Man lost forty Pounds which he had lent upon St. Andrew's Finger, except one Ounce of Silver with which it was covered. The Writers that live near the time say, about ten thousand Friars and Nuns were sent to seek for their Livings. The Abbots and Priors had small Penions. Burnet, Herbert.

(6) Fifteen Abbies, and sixteen Nunneries. The King's Letters Patents for that purpose are dated August 17. Burnet, Tom. I. p. 224. and Collett, p. 183.

(7) The Preamble of these Injunctions ran thus: "In the Name of God, Amen. By the Authority and Commission of the excellent Prince Henry, by the Grace of God King of England and of France, Defender of the Faith, Lord of Ireland, and in Earth supreme Head under Christ of the Church of England, Thomas Lewis Cromwell, Privy Seal, and Vice-gerent to the King's said Highness, for all his Jurisdiction Ecclesiastical within this Realm, do for the advancement of the Glory of Almighty God, increase of Virtue, and honour of the King's Majesty, give and enact unto you, that these Injunctions following be observed. This was the first act of pure Supremacy done by the King. For in all that went before, he had the Concurrence of the two Comocations. They were penned, it is like, by Crommer. They were not refused by the Majority of the Clergy. The great Profits they made by their Images and Relicks, and the Pilgrimages to them, were now taken away; and yet severe Impositions were laid upon them: A fifth for Repairs; a tenth at Michael Labour was also increased, and they were bound up to a third Life. In short, the very same Opinions about Purgatories, Saints, &c. and about instructing the People in the Christian Religion, in the vulgar Tongue, for which the Lollards were not long ago burnt, were now set up by the King's Authority. See Burnet's Collection, Tom. I. p. 160, &c.

following the Council of Thomas Cromwell, who was of a mean extraction. These grievances were, That he had suppressed a great number of Monasteries: That large Subsidies had been granted by Parliament without any occasion: That he admitted into his Council Persons of mean birth, whose sole view was to enrich themselves, instead of consulting the good of the State: That several Bishops had subverted the ancient Faith (1), and embraced new Doctrines, at all times condemned by the Church: That having seen so many religious Houses plundered, they were afraid the Churches would undergo the same fate.

The King returned an answer to these grievances in a large Manifesto (2). But as his reasons were grounded upon principles not admitted by the Malecontents, the Manifesto had no great effect. Mean while the King was greatly embarrassed; his Troops were few, and he had certain advice that a like insurrection was preparing in Yorkshire and other neighbouring Counties. He ordered few Troops, and trying to stop the progress of the Rebels. But the Duke finding too weak, thought it more proper to endeavour to appease the commotion by way of Negotiation than by arms. So when he sent to the Malecontents the King's answer to their grievances, he took occasion to let them know, they should not despair of pardon. Upon which, some of their heads privately sent him word, they had joined with the Rebels only to reclaim them, wherein they hoped to succeed, provided the King would be pleased to grant them a general pardon. The Duke disliked not this overture, which afforded him an opportunity to write to the King, and solicit him in their behalf, offering however to march against the Rebels if he was ordered. At the same time, the King received news that the Yorkshire-Men had taken Arms, and as he feared the others would join them, made haste and issued out a Proclamation, granting an absolute pardon to all that should return to their homes. The Proclamation succeeded according to expectation. The Rebels immediately dispersed, and so freed the King from great perplexity. Some however chose rather to join the Yorkshire Rebels than accept of the pardon (3).

The Insurrection of Yorkshire was much more dangerous than that of Lincolnshire. This last seemed to have been accidental and sudden. The other was in pursuance of a settled design, wherein were concerned several Persons of note, who only waited, before they declared, to see how the People in general were disposed. One Robert Aske, a Man of good judgment, headed the Malecontents of those parts, where the distance of the Court, and the neighbourhood of Scotland, rendered the People more bold than elsewhere, besides that the Monks had ever been in more credit in the northern Counties than in all the rest of the Kingdom. Since July, Aske had tried to gain the Lord Dacres, who had amused him some time with hopes that his Negotiation would succeed. Probably, this Lord sent the King the first notice of the Plot. At last, the Malecontents took arms, and assembled in very great numbers about the end of August, just after the Lincolnshire Rebellion broke out. When they saw themselves strong enough, they would not suffer the Lords and Gentlemen to remain neuter at home, but forced them either to fly or join with them, and swear they would be true to the cause, for which they intended to fight. This cause was properly Religion, as they plainly intimated, by putting a Crucifix in their Banners (4). Besides, they re-established the Monks in some of the suppressed Monasteries. As they met with no opposition, because the King's Forces were employed against the Rebels of Lincolnshire, they made great progress at first, and still much greater, after Richmondshire, Lancashire, the Bishoprick of Durham, and the County of Westmoreland engaged on their side. George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury was the only Person that ventured to take arms for the King without receiving his Commission, though he was not ignorant that at such a juncture his proceedings might be misinterpreted. But as he meant well, he hoped the King would forgive a fault committed purely for his Service. And indeed the King sent him a Commission, constituting him his Lieutenant against the Rebels. At the same time, he ordered the Duke of Suffolk not to stir from Lincolnshire, lest the Malecontents there should think of joining those of the North. Moreover, he gave Commissions to several Lords (5) to levy Troops, in order to form an Army, the command whereof he assigned for the Duke of Norfolk. But, either from the backwardness of the People, or for some other reason, the Army was not sufficiently numerous to resist the Rebels.

Whilst the King was making his preparations, Aske was not idle. He approached Pontefract Castle, where the Archbishop of York and Thomas Lord d'Aray were, and forced them to surrender the place. As these two Lords were reckoned well-affected to the Pope, many believed they were not sorry that the want of Provisions furnished them with a pretence to deliver Pontefract to the Rebels, and march with them in their other expeditions (6). Shortly after, Aske took also York and Hull, and by fair or foul means obliged all the Nobility of the Country to join his Army (7). Thus this affair grew daily more important, and the Court became apprehensive that the rest of the Kingdom would follow the example of the northern Counties. This apprehension was the more just, as at the same time there were in all parts Men who made it their business, to spread reports capable of inciting the whole Nation to rebel, by putting them in fear of the utter subversion of the Religion they had hitherto professed.

Mean while, the King chose to amuse the Rebels, till his Army was ready. The 20th of October he sent a Herald with a Proclamation to be read to the Troops. Aske gave the Herald audience, sitting in State with the Archbishop on the one hand, and the Lord d'Aray on the other. But when he heard the contents of the Proclamation, he sent him away without suffering him to publish it. Henry finding matters were in an ill way, dispatched the Duke of Norfolk with what Troops he had of Norfolk assembled, which were to be joined by those under the command of the Earl of Shrewsbury, and some others levied in haste by the Marquiss of Exeter (8). But these three small Bodies bore no proportion to the Forces of the Rebels. So the King found himself obliged to publish a Proclamation, commanding all the Nobility to meet him [at Northampton] the 7th of November. Mean time, Aske, at the head of thirty thousand Men, advanced towards Doncaster, where the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquiss of Exeter, and the Earl of Shrewsbury, were encamped with five thousand Men only, and having no other refuge but to defend the pass of the River between the two Armies. But as it was fordable in several places, they would doubtless have been extremely embarrassed, if a great rain, which fell very seasonably, had not made the River unpassable. This was certainly a very fortunate accident for the King. If his Troops had been defeated on this occasion, as it was very likely, considering their small number, it would have done him an unspeakable damage.

I have before observed, that the Duke of Norfolk approved not of the alterations made in Religion. And therefore, it could not but be very disagreeable to him to command the King's Army, against People who had taken Arms in a cause which he could not dislike. Mean while, he saw himself in a very dangerous situation, since he was as much afraid of conquering as of being conquered. In the first case, a victory over the Rebels would infallibly ruin the party he secretly favored. In the second case, he ran the risk of being suspected by the King, and forfeiting his favor. Happily for him, his inability to hurt 1536. the Rebels, freed him from this embarrassment, by affording him a pretence to proceed with him by way of Negotiation. As he held intelligence with some of their Leaders, he so ordered it by their means, that they came to a resolution to present a very humble Petition to the King. That done, they acquainted the Duke with its intreating him to second it with his interest. The Duke readily granted their request; but told them, that to obtain a favorable answer from the King, there must be a cessation of Arms, during which he took upon him to go himself and present their Petition. This proposal being accepted, the cessation was concluded, and the Duke departed for London (1). At such a juncture, this cessation was very advantageous to the King, because his Army being very weak, he wanted time to raise more Forces. For this very cause, many of the Rebels seeing that, contrary to all reason, the King had leisure given him to assemble his Troops, and imagining they were betrayed by their Leaders, withdrew to their Homes (2).

The discord which began to spread among the Rebels, gave the King some hopes of coming off upon easy Terms. And therefore he delayed sending an answer to their Petition, expecting their Army would disperse by degrees (3). But the Leaders perceiving at length that the Court purposely prolonged the Negotiation, and that those delays must utterly ruin their affairs, renewed their Hostilities, and resolved once more to attack the Royal Army. Had this resolution been executed, it would have, probably, charged the face of affairs very much; but another great rain fo swelled the River which parted the two Armies, that it was not possible for them to pass it (4). The King hearing of this, thought it necessary to give them some sort of satisfaction, for fear they should execute their resolution before he was ready. To this end, he sent them an answer to their Petition (5); but it was expressed in such general terms, that they could not depend upon what was promised therein. At the same time, he proposed, that if they would send three hundred Deputies to Doncaster, Commissioners should meet them there, and treat of a Peace. His aim was to gain time, in hopes, the three hundred Deputies would disagree, and their dissention, by prolonging the Negotiation, give him time to prepare his Army. A few days after, the Duke of Norfolk returning to Doncaster, sent word to the Rebels that he had brought them a general pardon, ten only excepted, six of whom were named, and four not. But this pardon was unanimously rejected, because the six Persons named were some of the heads, and every one was in fear of being one of the four whom the King had reserved. And indeed, the King had no other view but to sow discord among them, and make way for the Treaty at Doncaster, which they accepted at last, and sent their three hundred Deputies thither (6). The Court had expected, these Deputies would never agree about their demands, and so would afford the time that was wanted.

But as it was easy for the Leaders to discover the Court's intention, they gave the Deputies their instructions in writing, from which they were not to depart. These instructions contained ten Demands, which the Deputies made at the conference held at Doncaster the 6th of December.

I. They demanded a general pardon, without any exception.

II. That a Parliament should be held at York.

III. That a Court of Justice should be erected there, that the Inhabitants of the northern Counties might not be brought to London upon any Law-Suit.

IV. That some Act of the late Parliaments which were too grievous to the People, should be repealed (7).

V. That the Princess Mary should be declared Legitimate.

VI. That the papal Authority should be re-established upon the old foot.

VII. That the suppressed Monasteries should be restored to their former State.

VIII. That the Lutherans and all innovators in Religion should be punished severely.

IX. That Thomas Cromwell and Audley Lord Chancellor should be removed from the Council, and excluded from the next Parliament.

X. That Lee and Leighton, Visitors of the Monasteries, should be imprisoned, and brought to account for their bribes and extortions.

As the Deputies had not power to qualify these demands, so the King's Commissioners were not authorized to grant them. The King took care not to destroy in a moment the work of many years. Thus the conference ended without any fruit. The Duke of Norfolk was very sorry to see that the affair was like to be decided by Arms. He heartily wished, the King would grant the Rebels all their demands; but knew too well his humour and character, to venture to make him such a proposal. Meanwhile, he was extremely embarrassed. He must either betray the King's interest, or resolve to fight the Rebels, contrary to his own inclination, and with great danger of a defeat. At least, he could not avoid, pursuant to the intent of the Court, to prolong the affair till the King was ready to march, and then he saw, the ruin of the Rebels was inevitable. In this perplexity, he chose to write to the King, that the number of the Rebels daily increasing, there was danger of their making some attempt which it would be difficult to resist; and therefore, to prevent the threatened mischief, it was his opinion, if his Highness pleased, that some of their demands should be granted. Upon this Letter, the King empowered him to offer them a general pardon without exception (8), and promise them in his name, that the next Parliament should be held in the North. But withal, he ordered him not to make use of these remedies except in extremity, and when there was no other resource. The Duke receiving these Powers, thought proper to free him from his present embarrassment. He was unwilling openly to betray the King's interests, and on the other hand, did not care to be instrumental in the Rebels destruction, whose sentiments he approved, though he durst not shew it. So, after having, by his Correspondents, prevailed with the Leaders to comply with the King's offers, the agreement was concluded, and every Man returned to his home, to the great sorrow of the Monks and Bigots, who had expected quite another thing from their efforts to excite the People to rebel (9). But this agreement hindered not the Friars and Ecclesiastics of those parts, from continuing to foment against the People a Spirit of Rebellion, which broke out again, as we shall see hereafter. Something must now be said of the Emperor's affairs with the King of France, wherein all Europe was concerned.

When Francis I. began the War in Savoy, about the end of the last year, the Emperor was in Sicily, upon his return from his Tunis expedition, but unable to assist the Duke of Savoy. This made him chuse to try to cool the King of France's ardor by a Negotiation, till he could aid his Ally. The death of Francesco Sforza, which happened in the mean time, furnished him with an opportunity. He intimated to the French Ambassador residing at his Court, that he would not dispose of the Duchy of Milan, till he knew the King of France's sentiments. Francis being informed of it, demanded the Duchy for his second Son the Duke of Orleans, and the Emperor put him in hopes, he would give it to his third Son the Duke of Angoulême, upon certain terms, which left it in his power to prolong the Negotiation as much as he pleased. And indeed, he amused him in this manner till April 1536, one while insinuating upon the Person of the Duke of Angoulême, another while seeming inclined to confer the Duchy on the Duke of Orleans. Francis willing to end this affair, and knowing, the Emperor intended to go to Rome, sent the Cardinal of Lorraine for a positive answer, but left the events of the War should bring some obstacle to this Negotiation, he ordered Admiral Brion, who commanded in Piedmont, to cease hostilities.

Whilst the Cardinal of Lorraine was on his journey, the Emperor arriving at Rome, went, a few days after, to a public Consistory, which was assembled at his request. There, before the Pope and the Cardinals, he inveighed against the King of France, intimating, he was the sole Author of the Wars that had afflicted Europe ever since his Accession to the Throne. He thence took occasion to say, that instead of shedding so much innocent 1536. Blood, it would be better to decide their quarrel by single Combat with Sword and Poinard, [in their Shirts] in some Island, or in a Boat. But the next day, the French Ambassador demanding whether he designed to challenge the King his matter, he replied, he had no such intention; but meant only, that the expedient he propoed seemed to him more reasonable than a War.

The Emperor
in France.

Some time after, the Emperor being at Sienna, the Cardinal of Lorraine waited on him, and in his Audiences, discovered he had never intended to give the Duchy of Milan to a Prince of the Royal Family of France. He writ therefore to the King, that he was to expect War. And indeed, the Emperor was now assembling all his Forces, proposing to bring three Armies into the Field, one in Piedmont, which he intended to command in person, another in Picardy, and a third in Champagne. This design was already so publick, that Francis could not be ignorant of it. So, believing the Emperor meant to make his most powerful effort in Picardy, he recalled the greatest part of his Army in Piedmont, having ordered Turin and his other conquests in that Country to be well stored with Ammunition.

He came to Genoa the 2d of October, and embarked for Spain. This was the success of the Provence expedition, which he had been long meditating, and by means of which he hoped to give a mortal wound to France.

However, the King of Scotland expressing a very earnest desire for the Marriage, it was concluded in December, and the Nuptials were celebrated the 1st of January 1537. Let us return now to the affairs of England.

The Northern Rebellion was appeased, but in such a manner, that the cause still subsisted, the Male-contents having received no redress of their Grievances, except only that the King had promised to call a Parliament in the North, which he never intended to do. The pretence he used was, that they left in the Monasteries the Monks, they had restored. But this was a precarious excuse, if ever there was one, since it was not their business to turn them out, but the King's, who had the power in his own hands, whereas they had nothing more to say, after quitting their Arms. The King knowing how the People of the North stood affected, desired the Duke of Norfolk (1) to remain there with his Army, to keep them in awe. So the Duke was employed for some time, with causing Persons of all conditions to swear to be true to the King (2), a very improper remedy for so great a fort of evils, since the same compulsion which extorts Oaths from a discontented People, serves also for pretence to break them upon occasion. In the mean time, Alex, who had commanded the Rebels, was ordered to Court, where he was well received; but the Lord d'Arcy, who had not so readily obeyed the like order, was sent to the Tower, upon his arrival at London.

Shortly after, two Gentlemen of the North, Nicholas Muirgrave and Thomas Tilly, put themselves at the head of eight thousand Male-contents, and appeared before Carlisle, in order to take the City. But they were repulsed, and thereupon suddenly attacked by the Duke of Norfolk, they were entirely routed. Muirgrave had the good fortune to escape, but Tilly and seventy four others taken with him, were hanged on the Walls of Carlisle. Sir Francis Bigod and one Halam with another body of Rebels, attempted at the same time to surprize Hull; but were made Prisoners themselves, and executed.

These attempts rendered the King so fierce, that he put to death Alex and the Lord d'Arcy, notwithstanding the general pardon to appease the first Insurrection. The Lord d'Arcy accused the Duke of Norfolk of favouring the Rebels, which perhaps was too true. But the Duke cleared himself, or rather, the King thought not fit strictly to examine this accusation (3). Mean while, as he knew, the Emperor was contriving some Plot in Ireland, he gave order that Thomas Fitzgerald, Son of the late Earl of Kildare, and five of his Uncles, after a long imprisonment at London, should suffer death for a terror to the Irish. But the Earl of Kildare's youngest Son had the good fortune to escape, and fled for refuge to Cardinal Pole (4).

The King could not be perfwaded but that it was the Monks who most contributed to preserve and foment the People's discontents. He considered them as the chief Authors of the late Insurrections, and consequently as his personal Enemies. He believed to see in their behavior, that if they had power, they would not spare him, and therefore he projected their ruin, to prevent their designs. Herein he found two considerable advantages, the one to free himself from his enemies, and the other to enjoy their spoils. It is not to be doubted, this last consideration had also a share in his project of vengeance upon them. The suppression of the lesser Monasteries having only whetted his appetite, he resolved to suppress all the rest and seize their immense possessions (5). The more easily to accomplish his design, he used the same means, he had practised to suppress the lesser Monasteries; that is, he appointed a very strict Visitation of those that remained, not questioning but the discoveries which should be made, would promote his design.

The 12th of October the Queen was delivered of a Prince, who was called Edward. But his birth cost his Mother her life, who died two days after her delivery (6). As the King had caused his two Daughters by his former marriages to be declared Illegitimate, nothing could be more acceptable than the birth of a Son, who put the succession of the Crown out of all dispute. And therefore in a few days he conferred on him, as his Heir apparent, the title of Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and

The Lord d'Arcy and the Lord Huffy were arraigned at Westminster, before the Marquis of Exeter, then High-Steward, and found guilty of Treason. The Lord Huffy was beheaded at Lincoln, the Lord d'Arcy on Tower-hill, the 20th of June, and buried in St. Dunstons Church. He endeavored to purge himself, that he was forced to a Compromise with them, and pleaded, that the long Services he had done the Crown for fifty Years, he being Justiciary, together with his great Age and Infirmary, might mitigate the King's Displeasure. At his Departure, he left his Son Thomas Deputy in his room; who, upon a false report, that his Father, (then a Prisoner in the Tower) was beheaded, directed King Henry and his Authority, proclaimed open War, and applied to the Emperor for assistance; whereupon, he and five of his Uncles were arrested, and upon the King's sending an Army into Ireland, were taken, and brought over to London, and were beheaded on February 3. Gerard Fitz-Gerald, the Son of Kildare's youngest Son was packed up in a Bundle of Clothes and conveyed to Ireland, and so to France, and from thence to the Low Countries, in both which Places being required of our King, he at length fled to Cardinal Pole, who finding him a fit Instrument for his purpose, kept him in Italy, till he might be restored to his Country and Place. Disunion in Germany
about Religion Sicilian.

The affairs of Religion daily grew more important in a great part of Europe, by reason of the progress of the Reformation. Those who had embraced it, wished only to live in quiet with liberty of Conscience. But this was what the old Religion would never allow them. The glory of God, and zeal for the interests of the Church, served for pretence to this refusal. But the real Causes were, first, The pride of most Men, who cannot bear to be told that their opinions are wrong. Secondly, The temporal interest of the Clergy, who, wherever the Reformation was established, saw themselves deprived of their rich Benefices; the Revenues of the Church being applied by the Reformed to uses very different from those in which they had hitherto been employed. Thirdly, The Pope's interests, who daily lost his Subjects, his Revenues, his Credit, his Authority. There was another particular Cause in Germany, which inflamed the troubles occasioned by Religion, and that was, the Emperor and his Brother the King of the Romans, had formed a design to use the pretence of obliging the Protestants to receive the Pale of the Church. For this reason, instead of healing, they fomented the divisions to the utmost of their power.

They are favoured by the Emperor.

The Protestants complained, among other things, that a Council was called at Mantua, contrary to an express promise that it should be in Germany. Besides, they meant not to submit to the decisions of a Council, where the Pope presided, and which, as they perceived, would be far from being free. The Emperor amused them with evasive answers, till things should be ready to attack them. Mean while, the Pope, having deferred the opening of the Council from May to November, charged in that Interval the Cardinals Contarini, Sadoletti, Pole, Bembo, all Persons of great reputation, to examine wherein the Church wanted Reformation. These able Divines found nothing amiss as to the Doctrines. They only drew up, as to Discipline, a list of sundry trifles, which, in their opinion, deserved to be rectified. To these alone they thought the Reformation ought to be confined.

Gravities

Mean while, the Emperor was very seriously thinking of the affairs of Germany, though he took great care to conceive his designs from the Protestants. In order to free himself from all other incumbrances, and attack them with advantage, he had concluded the Truce with Francis, in hopes it would soon be followed by a Peace. He perceived, the Smalcaldick League would be an everlasting obstacle to the execution of his vast Projects, by Francis's and Henry's endeavours to gain it to their interests. So, his chief aim was to dissolve that League, that he might afterwards proceed against England with all the forces of Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low-Countries (2).

The Empe-
ror's conduct Arbitrary.

Henry easily judged, Charles V and Francis I, had agreed to a Truce, only in order to conclude a Peace very soon, which would rob him of the assistance of France. So, finding he had no refuge but in his own Forces, in case of attack, he considered early of means to prevent Invasions at home, which must have greatly unbalanced him, if he should be engaged in a foreign War. He knew, the Monks hated him mortally. They were the Persons that inspired the English with a Spirit of Rebellion, the more dangerous, as Religion was the principal Cause. So, to deprive the Pope and the Emperor of such a support in his own Realm, he resolved to suppress all the religious Houses still remaining in England. He had a farther motive, which was not inconsiderable, namely, to have a Fund sufficient to maintain the War, without being forced to over-burden his Subjects. But as the suppression of part of the Monasteries had already occasioned troubles in the Kingdom, it was likely, the suppression of all would raise still greater. Wherefore he believed he should prevent all commotions, by removing the People's veneration for the Monks. To this end, the report of the last Visitation being brought to him, he ordered it to be immediately published. Very probably, the Facts inserted concerning the disorderly lives of the Friars and Nuns, were set forth so as to be subservient to the King's designs (3). But what conducted most to recover People out of their superstitious fondness for the religious Houses, was the discovery of the frauds committed there with respect to Relics and Images. Had the business been only the debaucheries of the Monks and Nuns, it might have been objected, that it sufficed to make strict inquiry of those who were guilty, and to punish them severely. But for the pious frauds (as they are called,) it could hardly be thought but that the whole Society was concerned. For this reason therefore, the King, to make them as visible as the Sun, took care publicly to expose the counterfeit Relics found in the Monasteries, and the Springs by which the Images of our Saviour, the Virgin Mary, or any of the Saints were made to move, which was looked upon by the ignorant multitude as the effect of a divine Power. If the Reader desires to see a particular account of these pious impostures, he will find it, though withal very short, in the History of the Reformation of England. These frauds being thus detected, whatever had served to engage the People in superstition, was by the King's order burnt in Publick (4). But what grieved the Votaries most was, to see the Bones of Thomas Becket, commonly called St. Thomas of Canterbury, publicly burnt. They accused the King of acting from a motive of a sacrilegious Avarice, in order to have a pretence to seize the rich Shrine of that Saint, whereon, besides other precious Stones, was a very fine Diamond, offered in 1179 by Henry I, King of France, when he came in Pilgrimage to Canterbury (5). This proceeding so exasperated the Adherents of the old Religion, that they writ in a most virulent manner to Rome against the King, com-

They confess, they had neglected the Worship of God, lived in Idleness, Gluttony, Sensuality, &c. Baron, Tom. 1. p. 237.

(4) As here, says Lord Herbert, out of our Records I shall mention some of the Images and Relicks to which the Pilgrimages of these times brought Devotion and Offerings; as our Lady's Child's showed in seven places, and her Milk in eight. The Feet of St. Thomas of Lancaster, a Remedy for the Head-ache; the Finkenite and Boots of St. Thomas of Canterbury, and a piece of his Shirt, much revered by great-bellied Women; the coat that our St. Laurence; two or three heads of St. Ursula; St. John's Ears; and the pairing of St. Edmund's Nails; the Image of an Angel with one Wing, which brought forth the Spar's Head that pained Child's Side; an Image of our Lady, with a Taper in her Hand, called Our Lady of the Wax, together with a waxing, till one havinging himself thereon, it was cut, and was now found to be but a piece of Wood. The Countess Isabel in Kent, commonly called the Road of Grace, was a famous Imposture, to which many Pilgrimages were made, being contrived by a witch, by the help of Springes, to roll the Eyes, and move the Lips, to bow, to flake the Head, Hands and Feet. It was showed publicly to Queen's eyes, by John Bishop of Rochester, and after a Season upon it, three broken in pieces. Pol. 24. Another great Imposture was at Salisbury in Gloucestershire, where the blood of Christ brought from Jerusalem was showed in a Chitival Vial, and was said to have this Property, That if a Man was in a mortal Sin, and not absolved, he could not see it. Therefore every Man that came to behold this Miracle, was forced to continue to make Prayers, till he beheld Heaven to give him the sight of so blessed a Relic. This was now discovered to be the blood of a Duck renewed every week, and the one side of the Vial was so thick, that there was no seeing through it, but the other was transparent, it was so placed near the Altar, that one in a secret place behind could turn which side he pleased outward. There was brought out of Wales a huge Image of Wood, called Our Lady of the Wax, which St. Paul used to burn one Frier Trapp, who advised People in Confession not to believe the King's Supremacy. Besides which, the Imposture of our Lady of Walsingham, of Worcester, and St. John of Glaston, called otherwise Mad John Sherbo, who was said to have been the Devil in a Boy, &c. were publicly burnt. Herbert, p. 213. Compt. High. Stone, p. 152.

(5) For three hundred years he was accounted one of the greatest Saints in Heaven, as appears from the accounts of the Legends of the Virgins to this day. These great Affairs in Christ's Church in Canterbury. In one year there was offered at Christ's Altar, 36. 21. 6d. At the Virgin's only 4d. 12. 8d. But at St. Thomas's, 32s. 12d. 3d. The next year the odd 6d. was greater: At Christ's Altar not a Penny; at the Virgin's only 4d. 12. 8d. but at St. Thomas's, 9s. 6d. 6d. 3d. The rich Stone was offered by Henry VII of France, which our King set in a Ring and wore on his Thumb. The Spoil of the Shrine in Gold and precious Stones filled two Chests, which were to be heavy, that they were said to eight strong Men to carry them out of the Church. His name was struck out of the Kalendar: The day of raising his body, or as they called it, his Translation, being the 7th of July, which was not only a Holiday, but every sixth year there was a Justice for sixteen days together, as Insolence printed on all that visited his Shrine. Baron, Tom. 1. p. 244. Baron, p. 576.

paring him to the greatest Tyrants that ever lived. Whereupon, at Rome and other places, numberless Satyrs were penned, which painted Henry as the most execrable of Men, to those who were not used to the hyperbolic expressions of the Italians. The King had his Spies at Rome, who acquainting him with what was published against him, told him withal, that to Cardinal Pole the Informations sent from England were generally addressed, and that his stile was visible in some of the Satyrs. This so highly incensed the King against the Cardinal, that he made all his Family and Friends feel the effects, inasmuch that he would sooner have pardoned any Crime, than a correspondence with him. It is strange that the Cardinal, who seemed otherwise very prudent and moderate, should so give way to his zeal, or his passion against the King, that he feared not, by so unadvised a behaviour, to expose his Friends to Henry's utmost resentment. His obstinacy in this respect was so great, that at length he was the occasion of his Mother's losing her head on the Scaffold, as will be seen hereafter.

All the King's proceedings convincing the Pope that he was to expect no change in him, he published at length the Bull of Excommunication (1), drawn and signed in 1538. Moreover, he tried to excite all the Princes of Christendom against Henry, and offered the Kingdom of England to the King of Scotland. Nay, Pole maintained in a Book, published shortly after, that it was more meritorious to fight against Henry, than against the Turk. But the Pope's Thunders had so lost their force in England, that the Bull caused no commotion, or if it produced any effect, it was quite contrary to what the Pope expected. Henry being more provoked with him, took so good precautions to hinder him from executing his designs, that he thereby advanced the Reformation much more than he intended. As soon as he had heard of the Bull's being published, he required the Bishops and Abbots to swear again to renounce the Papal authority. At the same time, the new Translation of the Bible being presented to him, he ordered fifteen hundred Copies to be printed, and set up in the principal Churches, being satisfied that nothing would be found there to support the exorbitant power assumed by the Pope over all Christendom (2).

Shortly after, an Injunction was published by the Vicergerent, to teach the People the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments in English. Moreover, all Incumbents were ordered to instruct the People, by declaring, they must not trust in other Men's works, but in their own; and that Relicks, Beads, and the like, were unnecessary to Salvation. They were also to take down all Images, to which Offerings were wont to be made, and to suffer no Candles to be set up before any Image, except our Saviour's. In fine, they were to suppress all the Ora pro Nobis which were added to the Prayers addressed to the Saints (3).

This Injunction was deemed a mortal wound to the old Religion, whose adherents were in the utmost consternation. But no Man dared to stir, so absolute a way had the King acquired over his Subjects. Nay, the most discontented affected a blind submission to his Will, knowing the least suspicion would ruin them.

Gardiner Bishop of Winchester was now returned from his Embassy to France. He was one of the zealous adherents of the old Religion. Nay, he was suspected of being privately reconciled to the Pope, and of holding correspondence with the Emperor. But he so artfully diffused his sentiments, that he perwaded the King, it was only the devices of his enemies, on purpose to ruin him. It is however certain, though the King seemed satisfied, he had no great esteem for him, and yet suffered him to be near him on account of his extreme submission. His blind condescension to the King's Will, afforded him many opportunities to serve the Party he privately favored. The King considering him not as a suspected Person, since he so readily complied with his Orders, freely listened to him when he spoke against the Sacramentarians, being still extremely prepossessed in favor of the Doctrine of the real presence of Christ's Body in the Sacrament. Then Gardiner could explain his sentiment without fear, because they agreed with the King's. He insinuated to him, that so long as he left that Doctrine untouched, he would never be accused of changing his Religion, but would rather be extolled for having purged it in preferring the Essentials. Thus Gardiner ingaged him to persecute the Sacramentarians, not so much from a religious as from a political Motive. He knew the King's temper to be impatient of contradiction. And therefore, by engaging him to maintain a Doctrine which those of the new Religion could not admit, he hoped their resistance would provoke him against them, and thereby he would be more easily led to be reconciled to the Pope. That is to say properly, he employed, to alienate the King from the Protestants, the same means they used to prejudice him against their adversaries. But neither could succeed. Henry reformed himself but by halves, and was never reconciled to the Court of Rome. As he was grown absolute, he would never suffer his Subjects to go farther than himself, but compelled them to stop where he was pleased to stop, equally severe, or rather unmerciful, to those who refused to follow him, and to those who would go beyond him. He showed this year an instance of rigour capable of making the Reformers despair of any farther progress.

One [John Nicolson, alias] Lambert, being informed Henry did against as a Sacramentarian (4), the King convened a great Assembly in Westminster-Hall, where he was pleased himself to dispute publicly with the Party accused. The match was by no means equal. Lambert stood alone without a second; but the King was surrounded with a crowd of Persons, who applauded his arguments, and deemed them invincible; whereas none dared to approve of what Lambert urged. The dispute ended with the King's putting it to the choice of the unfortunate Lambert, either to abjure his opinion, or be burnt. But whatever advantage the King seemed to have, he may be said to be vanquished, since he was forced to fly to so rigorous a method to convince his adversary, after flattering himself to persuade him by dint of reason; otherwise, probably, he would not have engaged in the dispute. However, he succeeded not by this extraordinary way, since Lambert chose rather to die than abjure the opinion he still believed (5). Henry had no occasion to be flattered. He had but too good a conceit of himself. Nevertheless, Gardiner and the rest of his Party took occasion from this dispute to extol him above the most learned Divines of the age. They inspired him with such an opinion of his Learning, that he thought his notions ought to be a Standard to all. But contrary to the expectations of his Flatterers, this conceit of himself was no less fatal to them than to the other Party, since he resolved to punish severely and indifferently all who dared to swerve from what he himself deemed reasonable.

About this time the Emperor concluded with France a Negotiations ten years Truce, of which I shall speak presently. Henry, not doubting, it was in order to invade him, considered of means to raise him troubles which should divert him from his purpose. The Smalcaldick League furnished him with a good opportunity. But the preservation of the Augsburg Confession being the sole foundation of that League, he did not see that he could possibly join in it, to support a Religion, all whose Articles were not approved by him: So his design was, either to bring the Protestants to conclude with him a general League, which should not be limited to the defence of their Religion, or prevail with them to be satisfied with the Reformation he had himself introduced into England. To this end he sent Ambassadors (6) with instructions to fee who were the Confederates, and in case the League was confined

(2) Gratian the Printer, printed fifteen hundred Copies of his own Charge, which amounted to five hundred Pennies. This Bible was presented to the King by Cromwell, who procured the King's Warrant, allowing all to read it without Concord. For which Cromwell wrote Cromwell a Letter of Thanks, dated the 13th of August. The Translation had been sent over to be printed at Paris, the Workmen in England not being judged able to do it as it ought to be. It was recommended to Bucer's Care, then Ambassador at Paris, and much in Cromwell's Favour. It was printed in a large Volume; but upon Complaint of the French Clergy, the Press was stopp'd, and most of the Copies seized and burnt: But some were conveyed out of the way, and the Workmen and Forms brought over to England, where it was now finished. And one of these Bibles were to be set up in every Church, at the joint Charge of the Incumbent, and the Parishioners. Burnet, Tom. 1. p. 249. Strype's Mem. Tom. 1. p. 208.

(3) Every Incumbent was likewise enjoined to keep a Register of Weddings, Christenings, and Burials. And to preach one Sermon every quarter of the Year at least. See Burnet, Tom. 1. c. 12. p. 180. Strype, p. 596.

(4) Lambert, who had been Minister to the English Merchants at Antwerp, where being acquainted with Tindal and Frith, he became of their Opinion. He afterwards kept School at London, and hearing Doctor Taylor preach of the real Presence, he came to him upon it, and gave him his Reasons in writing, why he could not believe the Doctrine he preached. Taylor carried these Arguments to Cromwell, who was at that time of Lambert's Opinion, who he had drank in from his French Officers. Lambert was of the same Belief. Lambert being brought before them, they desired to make him retract his Argument, but all was in vain, for Lambert totally appealed to the King. Whereupon Gardiner perwaded the King to proceed solemnly and severely in it. The King was then prevailed with. So Letters were written to many of the Nobility and Bishops to come and hear this Trial. In November, on the Day prefixed, there was a great Appearance in the Hall. The King's Guards were all in White, and so was the Cloath of State. Burnet, Tom. 1. p. 242.

(5) Lambert argued with ten or another, particularly the King, Cromwell, Topham, and Stokely. Cromwell read his Sentence, declaring him an incorrigible Heretic, and condemning him to be burnt. Which was soon after executed in Smithfield in a barbarous manner; for when his Legs and Thighs were burnt to the Stumps, there not being Fire enough to consume the rest, two of the Officers milled his Body up with their Halberds, let him fall into the Fire, where he was quickly consumed to Ashes. The Protestants replied, their League consisted of twenty-six imperial Cities, and twenty four Princes, among whom the King of Denmark was lately admitted: That at present they could not be without their Divines, but desired him to declare himself positively upon the proposition made him, of embracing the Augsburg Confession. Some time after, they sent Ambassadors capable of disputing upon the points of Religion. But this Embassy was fruitless. Henry found in the Germans Men of a very different stamp from his own Subjects, and little inclined to compliance. They would not allow him Communion in one kind, Private Masses, Auricular Confession, Celibacy of Priests, and gave him their reasons in writing; to which he replied, though to very little purpose. As he could not put the same choice to them as he had done to Lambert, he was forced to dismiss them without any conclusion, being as little fastidious with them as they were with him.

Burnet.

An extraordinary Act for increasing the Royal Power.

By this and some former Laws, which settled what was to be believed in matter of Religion, all the Subjects were almost equally liable to the pains enacted therein. Indeed, this last Law with those that were made before against the Pope's authority, contained the King's belief, but not the Nation's. There was hardly a Person in the Kingdom but who believed either more or less, and yet no one dared openly to swerve from it either to the right or left. The Reformed however were the greatest sufferers by it, and indeed it was levelled against them. Gardiner Bishop of Winchester was the real Author of it. He had intimated to the King, that it was the only means to hinder a League from being formed against him. That what he had abolished not being essential to Religion, nor considered as such by the generality of Christians, no Man of sound judgment could deem him Heretical, so long as he maintained these fix Articles, which entirely distinguished true Catholics from Seckaries and Innovators. This was really taking the King by his weak side. But, besides this motive, the King had another which was no less powerful; namely, by adding this Law to those already made against the Pope, he rendered his Subjects so dependent upon him, that there was scarce a Man but what was obnoxious to be called to an account. So the Pope's friends and the Reformed were equally in his power. Consequently they were equally concerned not to displease him in any thing, but rather blindly to submit to his Will. Cranmer alone ventured publicly, and for three days together, to argue against the Bill before it passed. But as soon as it had received the Seal of the publick authority, he sent away his Wife into Germany till better times (2).

By another Act the Parliament granted to the King the Lands of the religious Houses, which were supposed to have been freely surrendered to him. So, this Statute was rather a confirmation of what had been done, than an ordinance for the suppression of the Monasteries (3). As the King had intimated that he intended to employ the Revenues, he had acquired, in useful foundations, the Parliament passed a Bill for giving him power to erect new Bishopricks.

Never was Parliament more devoted to the King's will. They were not satisfied with approving whatever the King had done, but also whatever he might do for the future. It was enacted this Session, That the same obedience should be paid to the King's Proclamations, or to the orders of the Council during a minority, as to the Acts of Parliament. It was pretended, that cases might happen where the King had not time to call a Parliament, and yet it was necessary for the good of the Realm that his orders should be executed, otherwise there might be danger of falling into great inconveniences. Thus to avoid a possible, but withal an uncommon inconvenience, another much more considerable was run into, by giving the Sovereign a despotick power. For if his orders were to be obeyed without the concurrence of the Parliament, he had no occasion to call one if he did not think it proper. It is true, there were some limitations in this Act, as that no Person should be deprived of Life or Estate by virtue of the King's Proclamation, nor any Laws or Customs broken or subverted thereby. But these restrictions were so ambiguously expressed, that it was easy for the King to evade them. Upon this Act were grounded the great changes of Religion in the Non-age of Edward VI.

In this same Session the Parliament passed an Act to regulate the precedence of the Officers of State; by which Cromwell, the King's Vice-gerent in Ecclesiastical affairs, though a Lock-Smith's Son, had the precedence of all Persons next the Royal Family (4).

Lastly, The Parliament confirmed the sentence of death passed upon the Marquis of Exeter and the rest who had been executed for holding a correspondence with Cardinal Essex, &c. Moreover for the same reason, they attained the Countess of Salisbury, the Cardinal's Mother, and the Marchioness of Exeter, without bringing them to a Trial. This last Act met with great opposition in the Parliament, many objecting, that to condemn Persons unheard was a breach of the most sacred and unalterable rules of justice. But Cromwell having sent for the Judges to his House, asked them, whether the Parliament had power to condemn Persons accused, without a hearing? The Judges replied, it was a nice and dangerous question; that Equity, Justice, and all sorts of Laws required that the accused should be heard; that however, the Parliament being the supreme Court of the Realm, from which there could be no appeal, the validity of their sentences, of what nature soever they were, could not be questioned. This was saying in other words, that the Parliament would therein commit an injustice, for which they could not be called to an account. Cromwell having reported to the Parliament the opinion of the Judges, the two Ladies of the Blood-Royal were condemned to die, by a Sentence which established a precedent the most pernicious that had ever been seen in England, and which proved fatal to its Author, as will appear. Mean while the King granted a full pardon to the Marchioness of Exeter, and a reprieve to the Countess of Salisbury, who was not executed till two years after. Thus the King daily acquired some fresh degree of authority. It might be said, he usurped it not, since it was given him by the Parliament, if the circumstances of the times had not rendered the very Parliament slaves to his Will.

Cranmer had strenuously opposed the Law of the fix Articles, and such an opposition would have infallibly ruined any other Person but that Prelate. But the King had an esteem for him which could not be easily changed, because he was persuaded the Archbishop acted according to the dictates of his conscience, whereas he had a quite contrary notion of the rest of his Ministers and Courtiers. Their blind compliance served only to make him despise them, though he liked to reap the advantage of their baseness. So having a real esteem and sincere affection for Cranmer, and imagining, he must have been extremely mortified that the Act had passed contrary to his opinion, and even apprehensive of having displeased him by his opposition, he sent the Duke of Norfolk to encourage him, and assure him of his constant kindness.

Cranmer

(1) There was first a committee appointed for examining the different Opinions, and drawing up Articles for an Agreement, consisting of Cromwell, the two Archbishops, the Bishops of Durham, Bath and Wells, Ely, Bangor, Carlisle and Worcester. But having spent eleven days in Debates, the Duke of Norfolk on the sixteenth of May told the Lords, that the Committee had made no Progress, not being of one Mind. Therefore he offered some Articles to their Consideration, that they might be examined by the whole House, and a perpetual Law made for the Observation of them. These were the fix Articles above. Cranmer argued against them three Days together, though his Arguments are lost, there is nothing remaining of what passed in the House, but what is conveyed to us in the Journal, which is short and defective. On the twenty fourth of May, that a Bill might be brought in for punishing such as offended against these Articles. Whereupon a Bill drawn up by the Archbishop of York, was after long Contest brought to the House the seventh of June; it was read a second time, and gave his Consent to it; but he humbly excused himself, for he thought he could after sitting in the House of Commons, it was sent into Conference to day and vote against it. On the twenty eighth, he lived with a Woman as his Wife, he was to be judged a Felon; and as for his Concubine, upon the first Conviction to forfeit all his Benefices, &c. and upon a second Conviction to suffer as a Felon. The Women so offending were to be punished in the same manner. For the Execution of this Act, Commissioners were to be sent to all Archbishops, Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries, and such others at the King shall name, to hold their Sessions quarterly or oftener, and to proceed upon Presentments by a Jury. Burnet, Tom. I. p. 279, &c.

(3) This Act passed in the House of Peers without any Protestation made by any of the Abbots, though it appears by the Journal, that at the first reading of it, there were eighteen Abbots present, at the second twenty, and seventeen at the third. It was soon dispatched by the Commons, and was offered to the Royal Assent. By it no religious Houses were suppressed, as is generally taken for granted, but only the Surrenders that either had been, or were to be made, were confirmed. The last Provision in it for annulling all Exemptions of Churches and Chapels, had been a great Happiness to the Church, if it had not been for the Clause, That the King might appoint others in their room. For many of those who purchased these Lands with the impropriated tithes, got the like in their Grants, that they should be the Visitors of the Churches formerly exempted, from whence great disorders have since followed; for the Incumbents being under no restraints, have often been scandalous to the Church. This abuse, which first sprung from the ancient Exemptions returned to the Founders and Donors by way of Reserver, or to have fallen to the Lords of whose Lands were bought by way of Elchance, or to have upon this reason, it is by the Will of the Donors they were totally alienated from them and their Heirs. But in England it went otherwise, the Emperor's Exchequer, Order of the Knights Templars was dissolved, it was then judged in favour of the Lord by Elchance. And this must have held good, if those Auctions and Endowments had been absolute without any condition. But the Endowments being generally made in consideration of so many Masses to be said for covered, the Lands should have returned to the Founders, and their Heirs and Successors. Now was there any ground for the Lords to pretend to them. For the Founders and Donors, certainly if there had not been a particular Provision made against them, they might have recovered the Lands true, many of them were of Royal Foundation, and these would have returned to the Crown without dispute. See Burnet's History, Vol. I. p. 262.

(4) By this Act, it was ordered, 1. That no Person of what state, degree, or condition soever, except only the King's Children, shall thenceforward sit at any side of the Cloth of Estate in the Parliament Chamber (as the two Archbishops used to do. See Fiddes's Life of Walsley, p. 304.) 2. That

For this cause he could not avoid the blame of having plundered the Church; whereas had he employed the best part of these Lands in things useful to the Church and State, he would have gained the Blessings of his Subjects and their Posterity. As to the Parliament, they are inexcusable for having put into the King's hands such immense Riches designed for pious uses, without taking care how they were to be employed. This is no slender evidence of what has been already observed, that the Parliaments met in this Reign only to be instrumental in gratifying the King's Passions, without ever examining either the motives or consequences of what he required. Henry had also formed the project of founding a College for young Students, that they might be qualified for the Service of the State, either in Embassies or other affairs of the Government (1). But this project miscarried with many others, because the King having sold the Lands of the suppressed Abbies, was very loth to put to such uses the ready money raised by the Sale. He chose rather to lavish it upon his pleasures, or his Courtiers, who used all sorts of Artifices, Condescensions, and base Flatteries, to procure some part of these vast Treasures.

The Protestants around the Emperor's Sentries, Sleidan.

Whilst Henry was employed in his domestic affairs, he had an eye however to what passed abroad. The Emperor reigned the last year a firm desire to adjust the religious differences which occasioned troubles in Germany. But this was only to draw money from the Protestants, to be expended in his War with the Turk. He expected that upon the bare hopes, he was pleased to give them, of redressing their Grievances, they would on his account drain themselves of Men and Money, and so become less formidable. But the Protestants would not suffer themselves to be deceived to such a degree. They plainly answered to his demand, that they could do nothing for him, without sufficient Security of being left in peace.

Henry finding that a rupture between the Emperor and the Protestants was not very remote, sent fresh Ambassadors to Germany to strengthen the resolutions of the Smalcaldick League, by hopes of his coming into it, and being declared Protector. But the Germans had now discovered his design, which was to amuse them, and keep the Emperor in continual fear of his uniting with them. They returned therefore the same answer as before, that the sole intent of their League was to maintain the Augsburg Confession, and if the King refused to admit that Confession, it was in vain to treat of other points: That moreover, they heard with extreme grief, that he persecuted in his Realm such as held the same opinions with them on sundry Articles of Religion, and therefore, so long as the Act of the Six Articles subsisted, there was no likelihood that he really intended to join with them. Melancthon even writ him a Letter in very strong, though respectful terms, to shew him the unreasonableness of that Statute.

Gardiner directs the King from his designs to join with the Protestants. Burnet. Herbert.

Henry, to whom all was obedient in England, and whose Will was a Law, was offended at the firmness of the German Princes. On the other hand, Gardiner, who dreaded of all things the King's union with the Smalcaldick League, failed not to use this occasion to divert him from it, by flattering his vanity. He represented to him, that it was very strange, petty Princes should pretend to be a pattern to a great Monarch, and dictate to the most learned Prince in Europe, in matters of Religion. He added, that whatever the Protestants might pretend, they would never approve of his Supremacy in England, because it would be a tacit engagement to own that the Emperor had the same right in Germany. This was false reasoning, since there was a wide difference between the Authority which the King had over his Subjects, and that which the Emperor could claim over the Sovereigns and free Cities of Germany. However, he attained his ends, that is, he begot a great coldness between the King and the Protestants.

Bibles as set up in the Churches.

Gardiner's artifices might have been more prejudicial to the Reformation, if, on the other side, the Reformers had not raised a Counter-battery, of which they made wonderful use. The King was so jealous of his Supremacy, that he neglected nothing to support it. Indeed, the absolute power acquired over his Subjects placed him above all opposition, but he withheld of all things, the Nation was convinced of the justice of that Prerogative. Hence the Reformers took occasion to remonstrate to him, that nothing but the reading of the Holy Scriptures could undeceive the People of their false notion of the Papal Authority. By this means they had already obtained, Barnet, that there should be a Bible fastened with a Chain in every Church, to be freely perused by all persons. But as many scrupled publicly to read the Scriptures, for fear of being suspected of Heresy, Gramer, meeting with a favorable opportunity, represented to the King, that it was necessary to give his Subjects leave to have a Bible in their Houses. He insinuated to him, that every one having liberty to read it, would easily be convinced, that the Pope's pretended authority had no foundation in the Scriptures. This was an innocent Stratagem, to procure the People an opportunity to instruct themselves in many other Articles, though the King had only one in view. Gardiner readily perceived the consequence of the Archbishop's request, and seeing the King inclined to grant it, did all he could to divert it. He disputed upon this Subject with Gramer in the King's presence, who heard them very attentively. At last, perceiving solid Learning in what Gramer said, and nothing but vanity in the reasonings of his Adversary, he suddenly rose up, saying to Gardiner, that such a Novice as he was not fit to contend with an old experienced General (2). Shortly after, he issued out a Proclamation, declaring he was desirous to have his Subjects attain the Knowledge of true Religion in God's Word; and therefore he would take care they should have an exact Translation of the Bible. He forbade however, in order to prevent the inconveniencies which might arise from the difference of the Versions, the selling of any Bible but what should be approved by the Vicegerent (3).

About the end of this year was seen a fresh effect of the mutual confidence which appeared between Charles V. and Francis I. A mutiny arising in Genoa by reason of a Tax laid upon Wine by the Governor of the Lombard Countries, the Mutineers applied to the King of France to implore his protection, and even offered to submit to him. But he did not think proper to accept of their offers. On the contrary, he informed the Emperor of what was plotting against him. This seems something strange, considering that hitherto he had never professed much generosity to that Monarch. But the reason of this proceeding was, the Emperor still assured him with the hopes of the Duchy of Milan, and so diverted him from the thoughts of recovering it by Arms. However this be, the Emperor's presence in Flanders being alone capable of appeasing the Sedition of Genoa, he was at some loss which way to get thither in time. It was dangerous going by Sea, as well on account of the Season, as because he had no Fleet to convoy him. The way through Italy was no safer, by reason he could not afterwards cross Germany without passing through the Territories of the Protestant Princes. There remained no other way but by France, which he resolved upon, though he had as much reason to suspect that Kingdom as Germany. But he hoped to amuse the King by means of the Duchy of Milan, as he did in effect. He set out therefore and entered France with a small train, upon the bare security of a safe-conduct. Nay, he refused to take in Hostage the Dauphin and his Brother the Duke of Orleans, who came and received him at Bayonne, offering to stay in Spain so long as he should be in the King's Dominions. Where-ever he came, the same respect was paid him as to the King himself, and he arrived at Paris the first of January 1540.

The King's Marriage with Ann of Cleves concluded. Hall. Herbert.

(1) As this was the noblest Design that ever was projected in England, it will not be amiss to give some short account of it. Six Nicholas Dutton (who was afterwards one of the chief Ministers that ever this Nation bred), together with Thomas Denton and Robert Cary, were ordered to make a full, perfect, and true Catalogue of the Nature and Orders of such a House, which they brought to the King in writing, the Original whereof is still extant. The Design of it was, That there should be frequent Pleasings, and other Exercises in the Latin and French Tongues; and when the King's Students were brought to some ripeness, they should be sent with his Ambassadors to foreign Parts, and trained up in the Knowledge of foreign Affairs, and so the House should be the Nursery for Ambassadors. But before any of them might write on these Subjects, the Lord Chancellor was to give them an Oath, that they should do so it truly without respect of Person, or any other corrupt Affection. This noble Design miscarried: But if it had been well regulated, it is easy to gather what great and publick Advantages might have flowed from it. Among which it is not inconsiderable, that we should have been delivered from a Rabble of ill Writers of History, who have without due Care and Inquiry delivered to us the Transcriptions of that time imperfectly, that there is still need of inquiring into Registers and Papers for these Matters: Which in such a House had been more clearly conveyed to Posterity, that can now be expected after such a want of Records, and other Confusions, in which many of these Papers have been lost. Barnet, T. m. l. 269.

(3) And about the same time issued out a Proclamation for Uniformity in Religion, which the Reader may see in Strype's Mem. Tom. I. p. 354. Coll. p. 295.

perer was travelling through France in his way to the Low Countries. Henry, receiving advice of her arrival at Richelieu, went down Angers, being very impatient to see whether he had been served. But, to his sorrow, he found her very different from what his Picture, drawn by His Holiness, had caused him to expect. This had not only such a reverse on her, that he would have immediately broke off the Marriage, if he had not been prevented by strong reasons. The first considerations which had made him conclude it, subsisted, and there were others which obliged him to consummate it. The Duke of Orleans was the Emperor's Neighbour in Flanders, and had also a pretension as well as to the Duke of Guelders, after the death of the Duke of that name. Consequently, in case of a War between the Emperor and France, that Prince could give the Emperor a very trouble some Guelders in Flanders. On the other hand, as Sister was married to the Duke of Saxony, and the Duke of Smalcalde League, with whom it was of great import to the King to live in a good understanding. But this was not all. The Emperor, then in France, was labouring with all his power to disengage France from the interests of England. Nay, Henry had private intelligence, that the Emperor offered to give the Duke of Orleans to the Duke of Orleans upon that consideration. It therefore, in such a juncture, he had great need the Princess of Orleans without marrying her, on the hazard of an entire rupture with the Princess of Smalcalde, at a time when he law himself upon the point of being taken by the King of France, who by degrees lost the assistance he had received from him in his most urgent occasions. So, lamenting his misfortune to be forced to marry a Princess for whom he had conceived an aversion, he resolved to make this Sacrifice the 6th of January 1530. But he was still less pleased after his Marriage than before, and from that very moment was determined to be divorced from her. He concealed his intentions however as much as possible, though it was easy for all to see his vexation and trouble. Cromwell, who had drawn him into the marriage, quickly felt the effects of his engagement, though the King was exceeding careful to conceal it from him.

The Parliament meeting the 12th of April, Cromwell made a speech to both Houses, informing them, that the King, being with extreme concern so great division among his Subjects in matters of Religion, had appointed Commissioners to examine the points in dispute, that the Articles of Faith might be fixed without respect of Parties by the word of God. That he was very desirous as he was to have the knowledge of the truth; but then he was refused to permit without mercy, such as he thought to prefer in private, before the establishment of laws. The Commissioners named by the King were Cardinal, and had orders to begin this examination the 15th of April. Two days after the King created Cromwell Earl of Essex (4).

During the Session, the Parliament suppressed the order of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who are now called Knights of Malta. Their dependence on the Pope and the Emperor was the cause of their ruin. There is no doubt, the desire of minding their spoils in these parts, the King to provide their suppression. And because the Parliament took him all their Lands as they had given him those of the Abbots. Though they had had no Revenue since in England and England, the King allowed however, but those thousand pounds for their maintenance after their suppression (5). The affair being ended, the Parliament was prorogued to the 25th of July.

A few days after, there fell upon Cromwell a storm, which probably had been gathering some time before. This Minister had many enemies, and enviers. He was son of a Farrier or Lock-smith; and though his birth was so mean, he was raised to great honour, even to a Flanders Mare to him.

ving the precedence of all the Lords in the Kingdom, except the Royal Family. All the Nobles envied him. The whole parish Party also hated him mortally, denouncing him the first article of the Capricious of the Abbots, and one of the principal inciters of the King to all the innovations he had made in Religion. Among these, who were very numerous, the Duke of Norfolk and Gloucester were the Persons that could do him most hurt, because they had free access to the King. These two Courtiers perceiving the King's inclinations for the new Queen, doubted not of his ill-will to Cromwell, but in gaging him in this Marriage, and resolved to make use of this occasion to ruin him. They hoped when he was removed, it would not be impossible to procure an agreement between the Emperor and the King, and then, a reconciliation with the Pope, which Cromwell had always opposed to the utmost of his power. Two other things greatly contributed also to the downfall of this Minister. The King had always employed him, in his correspondence with the Smalcalde League, and so long as he thought he wanted that League, he could not be without his assistance. But growing cold at length to the German Princes, as I before observed, and knowing, the dreadful Union between Charles V and Francis I, was only a Chimera, and consequently he should have no need of Cromwell, Cromwell became less necessary. The second thing which helped to ruin Cromwell was, the King fell in love with Catherine Howard, the Duke of Norfolk's Niece. Norfolk finding his credit considerably increased, made use of it to procure the Minister's destruction. As soon as he had a fair opportunity, he represented to the King, "That there were many Malcontents in the Kingdom, and good Men could not be persuaded that a Prince like him, would willingly give any occasion of discontent to his People: That they inferred from thence, he must have been ill-served by his Minister, who doubtless had abused his confidence: That as the People seemed dissatisfied only with regard to Religion, it was natural to think, this happened through the Vice-gerent's fault, whose conduct perhaps it would be proper to examine: That he was accused by the publick of many things, which, if true, rendered him the most guilty of all others, considering the favours heaped on him by the King: That besides, though no particular Fact could be proved upon him, it was however a very great crime to rob the King of the hearts of good part of his Subjects: That he took the freedom therefore to tell him, in order to quiet their minds, there was no better way than to sacrifice to them so odious a Minister." These insinuations, which were doubtless seconded by Gardner and other enemies of Cromwell, produced at length the desired effect. The King, prejudiced against him, resolved to dispatch him out of the way, without knowing yet of what he was guilty. But he found in his death a double advantage. First, he discovered his resentment against him on account of the Marriage, he had drawn him into. Secondly, he believed to make his People a specious example of silence at their murmurs (6).

This resolution being taken, and the Parliament meeting the 17th of June, the Duke of Norfolk accused Cromwell of High Treason at the Council Board, and received orders to arrest him and send him to the Tower. This illustrious Prisoner had the common fate of all disgraced Ministers. In a moment, he was forsaken by all but his friend Crommer, who alone ventured to write to the King in his favour, though to no purpose.

Cromwell being in the Tower, the Articles of his impeachment were drawn, consisting in Generalities, of which not so much as the least proof was offered to be given. The King knew, if his process was made according to the usual forms, he might produce Warrants which would fully clear him, and which could not be disclaimed. For this reason it was thought proper to bring his affair before 1540. the Parliament, and cause a Bill of Attainder to be passed against him, without allowing him to make his defence (1). In this manner had he himself proceeded in the affair of the Marchioness of Exeter and the Countess of Salisbury, and therefore could not think it strange the same thing should be practised in his case. The Parliament, ever slaves to the King, deemed the impeachment just, though destitute of proof. So by an Act, declaring him attainted and convicted of Heresy and Treason, he was condemned as a Traitor and Heretic, the Parliament leaving it to the King's choice to make him suffer the punishment of either of those crimes. This, joined to some other foregoing, as well as following instances, shew to what height the King had carried his authority, since to what height his will was sufficient to be immediately obeyed, even by those whose bulwarks and interest it chiefly was to reduce his power within due bounds. The execution of the Sentence was deferred till after the Session of the Parliament.

The King is determined to null his Marriage.
Henry was so tired of his Queen, that he could not bear the vexation to see himself engaged for the rest of his life in a disagreeable a Marriage. He resolved therefore to divorce her, let what would be the consequence, especially as the reasons which induced him to marry her no longer subsisted. He had lost all hopes of making a League with the Protestants of Germany, and his fears of the Emperor were vanished, since he saw every thing tending to a rupture between him and France. He only wanted a pretence to demand a Divorce, and give some colour to the proceedings of the Clergy and Parliament, of whose concurrence he was sure, however slight the pretence might be. He found one in a precontract between the Queen and the Duke of Lorraine's Son. But this contract was so slight, that the consequences were to be much pressed, to make it serve for the foundation of dissolving Ann's Marriage with the King. The Duke of Cleves and the Duke of Lorraine had formerly, it seems, in a Treaty, agreed upon a Marriage between Ann of Cleves and the Prince of Lorraine, both minors. This agreement had never been confirmed by the Parties when of age. On the contrary, the Ambassador of the Duke of Geldres, who acted as mediator in that Treaty, declared afterwards by an authentic Instrument, that this Article was deemed null. However, when Henry's Marriage with Ann was concluded, this pre-engagement raised a difficulty. But the Ambassadors of Saxony and Cleves positively promised to clear that point, and put it out of all doubt as soon as the Princess should arrive in England. Ann being come to Greenwich, the King, who liked her not, insisted upon this same point, in order to send her back. For that purpose, he called a Council, and sending for the Ambassadors, the explanation, they had promised, was demanded. But they had brought nothing with them, looking upon this difficulty as little material. Mean while, the Council telling them that good proofs were expected and not bare words, they offered to produce within three months an authentic abstract from the Chancery of Cleves, to prove what they had alleged. This alone would not have been capable of inducing the King to proceed, if, as has been said, there had not been strong reasons to cause him to accomplish his Marriage. So, the Council was of opinion, that if there were no other objection, the Marriage might be lawfully solemnized. The abstract from the Chancery of Cleves being come, great exceptions were found to it, upon the ambiguity of the word Espousals, because it was not expressed whether they were Espousals by the words of the present or of the future Tense. But as the King would not yet commence the affair of his Divorce, he caused the abstract to be kept, in order to make use of it when there should be occasion. Upon this therefore he resolved to found his Divorce.

The Parliament pray the King to examine the validity of his Marriage.
The Parliament, after a prorogation of some days, meeting again, Henry sent the Queen to Richmond. A few days after, a motion was made in the House of Lords, to present an Address to the King, to desire him to suffer his marriage to be tried. After what has been seen, it can't be imagined any Lord would be so hardy as to dare to make such a motion, unless he was sure of the King's approbation. So, the motion being assented to, the Lords desired the concurrence of the Commons (2); after which, they went in a Body (3) to present their address to the King. Henry protested to them, that he sought only the Glory of God, the Good of his People, and the Declaration of Truth. Then he agreed that the affair should be referred to the Clergy, who immediately appointed Commissioners to examine the Witnesses (4). All that could be gathered from the King's own Deposition, and those of the Witnesses, was, That there had been a Pre-contract between the Queen and the Prince of Lorraine, which was not sufficiently cleared: That the King, having espoused the Queen against his Will, had not given an inward consent to his Marriage, without which, it was affirmed, his promises could not be obligatory, a Man's act being only what is inward: That the King had never consummated the Marriage: That the whole Nation had a great interest in the King's having more issue, which they saw he could never have by the Queen.

The King must have had a very ill opinion of the Convocation, the Parliament, and the Publick, to alledge such extraordinary causes of his Divorce. The first had been discussed before the Celebration of the Marriage, and the Council was of opinion, it could be no just impediment. As to the second, if that maxim took place, Contracts would be of no use, since one of the Parties might say, he had not given an inward consent. This would be establishing, without remedy, Infidelity, Fraud and Perfidiousness in the highest degree. As for the third, the King had doubtless forgot what he had alleged in the process of his Divorce with Catherine. He then maintained, pursuant to his Clergy's opinion, that the Consummation of Arthur's Marriage with Catherine was not necessary to render it valid, but that the bare consent of the Parties made it complete. The fourth was of no greater weight, since there was no necessity of nulling the Marriage, under colour that the King was not pleased to lie with the Queen. Besides, he had now an Heir. In short, his word must be taken, when he said, he had not consummated his Marriage; his word, who sued for the Divorce, and who used this argument to obtain it. Mean while, the Clergy thought these Reasons solid, and passed a Sentence of Divorce upon them, and the Parliament were so affected, as to prostitute themselves to the King's passion, and confirm the Sentence (5). There is no distinction to be made here, since neither in the Convocation, nor in the Parliament, was there one single Vote against the Divorce; so much did every one dread to incur the King's displeasure. This is a remarkable evidence of what I have often intimated, that in every thing transacted in England during the latter part of Henry VIII's Reign, the Parliament and Clergy ought to be considered only as the King's instruments to gratify his passions. To him is due the praise of whatever was good and useful, and he it is that ought to be blamed for whatever was amiss. Mean while, the Parliament and Clergy are inexcusable for not having endeavoured to support the Cause of Justice and Truth, when they believed them to be oppressed.

The Queen was much troubled at what had been done in her absence, and even without her being examined. Probably, she had entertained no great affection for a Spouse, who had never given her any token of his love. However, though the King had thought it needless to ask her approbation, when he was meditating the Divorce, because then the Clergy and Parliament only were concerned, whom he knew to be at his devotion, he demanded her consent to what had been done, thinking no doubt the better to justify himself to the World. At the same time he offered by Letters-Patents to declare her his adopted Sister, with a Pension of four thousand Pounds a year (6), and her choice either to live in England, or return home. She agreed to all without solicitation, and chose to live in England, where she hoped to pass her time more agreeably than at Cleves, in her Brother's

(1) The Bill was brought into the House of Lords, Cromwell being then absent, on the 17th of June, and read the first time; and on the 19th was read the second and third time, and sent down to the Commons, where it stuck ten Days. And then a new Bill, conceived by the Commons, was brought up with a Preamble annexed to it. They also sent back the Lords Bill. It seems they rejected the Lords Bill, and yet sent it up with an unparliamentary Preamble. Burnet, Tom. 1. p. 277.

(4) On the 9th of July it was brought before the Convocation, and the Cause was opened by the Bishop of Winchester, and a Committee appointed to consider of it; and they deputed the Bishops of Durham and Winchester, with Whitby, and Leighton Dean of York, to examine Witnesses that Day. Burnet, ibid.

(5) Sentence was given the 9th of July, which was signed by both Houses of Convocation; and had the two Archbishops Seals put to it, of which whole Type the Record does yet retain, having elapsed the Fate of the other Books of Convocation. The Original Depositions are also extant. Burnet observes, this only can be said for their Sake, that the King's Reasons were as just and weighty as used to be admitted by the Court of Rome for a Divorce; and most of them being Canonical, and knowing how many Precedents there were to be found for such Divorces, they thought they might do it as well as the Popes had formerly done. Burnet, Tom. 1. p. 281.

(6) There is a Synode, a List of the several Manors and Estates, granted her by the King for Life; but it is no where said, that they were four thousand Pounds a Year. See Tom. 14. p. 710. &c. Bishop Burnet says, it was only three thousand Pounds a Year. See Tom. 1. p. 282.

1540. Court. Besides, it is likely she believed her Pension would be more secure if she remained in England, than if she lived abroad. Every thing being thus settled, she writ to the Duke her Brother, that she approved of the Divorce, and desired him to live in good understanding with the King (1).

This grand affair being finished, the Parliament passed an Act to moderate one of the six Articles in the bloody Statute. This Article, as the other five, made it death for the Priests to break their vow of Chastity; but by this last Act, the pains of death were turned to forfeiture of Goods.

All the rest of this Reign will be only a continued series of sensible proofs of the slavish Subjection the English Nation was reduced to. But, in this very Session of Parliament, there are three, which ought not to be passed over in silence.

The Commissioners appointed by the King, pursuant to an Act of Parliament, to examine the Doctrines of Religion, having drawn a long Memorial, and set down certain Articles as undeniable and absolutely necessary, it was moved in the House of Lords, to pass into a Law what these Commissioners had already done, and whatever they should do for the future by order of the King. This motion being received, a Bill was brought in immediately, and [when passed] sent down to the Commons, who agreeing to it, sent it up again the next day. By this Statute it was enacted, That not only the Memorial drawn by the Commissioners, provided it were approved by the King, but likewise whatever the King should enjoin for the future in matters of Religion, should be believed and obeyed by all his Subjects. This was investing the King with the infallibility taken from the Pope. Greater Signs of Slavery can hardly be seen, since the Parliament gave the King Power over Conscience, after having in a manner rendered him master of Life and Fortune. Moreover a Clause was inserted in this Act, which under colour of limiting the King's Authority sensibly enlarged it, namely, That nothing should be done or determined by virtue of this Act, which was contrary to the Laws of the Realm. These contradictory Clauses in the same Statute rendered the King Arbitrator of the lives of his Subjects, since on the one hand, they were enjoined to submit to the King's Will in matters of Religion, without knowing however what he would please to prescribe, and on the other, were forbid to do any thing contrary to the Laws. Consequently, in case the King commanded any thing contrary to the Law, they were liable to be prosecuted by virtue of this Statute, whether, against Law, they obeyed the King, or, in Obedience to the Law, refused to comply with his Will. The Acts passed in this Reign are full of such Contradictions, which were not inserted without design.

The Parliament passed another Bill which carried no less marks of servitude. It was enacted, that a Marriage already consummated should not be annulled, on pretence of Pre-contract or any other impediment not mentioned in the Law of God. Without doubt the Parliament had, or perhaps feigned to have, forgot, that the King's Marriage with Ann Bullen was annulled by reason of a Pre-contract, and upon this same foundation, during this very Session, they had approved the dissolution of his Marriage with Ann of Cleves. It is true, the King declared, it was not consummated. But Catherine of Aragon protested the same thing with respect to her Marriage with Prince Arthur, and yet it was decided, that a Party concerned should not be believed even upon Oath, when there were the presumptions to the contrary.

These were real contradictions, but not minded by the King. His aim was to legitimate the Princess Elizabeth by virtue of the former branch of the Act, and to remove, by the latter, the impediments in the Canon Law, to his intended Marriage with Catherine Howard, who was Cousin-German to Ann Bullen (2).

Before the Parliament broke up, the Clergy of the Province of Canterbury, assembled in Convocation, offered the King a Subsidy of four Shillings in the Pound, of all Ecclesiastical preferments, to be paid in two years, in acknowledge (as they said in their Address) of his care to free the Church of England from the tyranny of the Pope. The King gladly accepted their present, which was readily confirmed by the Parliament. But this was not sufficient for the King's occasions. In a few days, he demanded also an aid of Money of the Commons. Though for some time the Parliament had been wont to submit without examination to the King's pleasure, this demand met with some sort of opposition in the Lower House. And indeed, it could not but seem strange, considering the King was in peace with all the World, and besides, he could not be imagined to have already consumed the Money procured by the suppression of the Abbies. Some of the Commons represented, that in time of Peace, and within the space of one year, the King had spent such immense Sums, there was nothing more to do but to give him all the Lands in the Kingdom, which too would not suffice for the expence of few years. But these Speeches had no great effect. It was answered by the King's Party, that he had laid out vast sums in securing the Coasts (3), and that the keeping his Subjects in peace [and plenty] cost him more than the most burthenome War. These reasons, though very weak, passed for incontestable, and the Commons granted the King a Subsidy, as large as if he had been actually engaged in a dangerous War (4). This is a third proof of the Parliament's slavery. Mean while, the People could not conceive what was become of all the Money the King had lately received, and which should have supplied his necessities for many years.

This Parliament, which had given the King so great testimonies of a boundless compliance, was dissolved the 24th of July. But the King was pleased first to require his Subjects with a free and general Pardon, as it was called, though the exceptions limited the benefit to few Persons. All those were excluded who had been condemned for denying the King's Supremacy, or for transgressing some one of the six Articles of the bloody Statute, and even those who were only accused of these Crimes which were then unpardonable. The Counts of Salisbury, Cardinal Pole's Mother, and Thomas Cromwell were excepted by name.

As Cromwell's execution had been deferred, he was in some hopes of obtaining his Pardon, and the more, as he having writ to the King a very submissive Letter, he was so moved with it, that he caused it to be thence read. But the solicitations of the Duke of Northfolk and Gardner, seconded by those of Catherine Howard, who acted in their favour, rendered the endeavours of the Prisoner fruitless. The King signed a Warrant to cut off his head the 28th of July (5), about six weeks after his condemnation. Cromwell left a Son of whom he was very fond, he would say nothing on the Scaffold that might do him a prejudice. He contented himself with showing, that he willingly submitted to the sentence the Law had passed on him. He prayed for the King's prosperity, and declared he died in the profession of the Catholic Religion (6). These last words were variously interpreted, according to the passions and prejudices of the two Parties in matters of Religion. Though it was certain, Cromwell had lived in the opinions of the Lutherans, the contrary Party maintained, he recanted at his death, and that by the Catholic Religion was to be understood the old Religion, professed in the Kingdom before all the Innovations. The others pretended, these words ought to be taken in a more general sense, and at most to signify only the Religion which was then established. However this be, the care Cromwell took when he came to die, to say nothing that might offend the King, turned to his Son Gregory's advantage, who was this very year created a Peer of the Realm, by the Title of Lord Cromwell. The Office of Vicegerent enjoyed by the Father, died with him, no one desiring a Post so obnoxious to envy, and so fatal to the first Possessor. Besides, the Duke of Northfolk and the Bishop of Winchester, who were then in great credit, took care not to solicit the King to fill a place, which would engage the Person who held it, to use all his interest to hinder a reconciliation with Rome (7).

Every thing being thus settled, she writ to the Duke her Brother, that she approved of the Divorce, and desired him to live in good understanding with the King (1).

This grand affair being finished, the Parliament passed an Act to moderate one of the six Articles in the bloody Statute. This Article, as the other five, made it death for the Priests to break their vow of Chastity; but by this last Act, the pains of death were turned to forfeiture of Goods.

All the rest of this Reign will be only a continued series of sensible proofs of the slavish Subjection the English Nation was reduced to. But, in this very Session of Parliament, there are three, which ought not to be passed over in silence.

The Commissioners appointed by the King, pursuant to an Act of Parliament, to examine the Doctrines of Religion, having drawn a long Memorial, and set down certain Articles as undeniable and absolutely necessary, it was moved in the House of Lords, to pass into a Law what these Commissioners had already done, and whatever they should do for the future by order of the King. This motion being received, a Bill was brought in immediately, and [when passed] sent down to the Commons, who agreeing to it, sent it up again the next day. By this Statute it was enacted, That not only the Memorial drawn by the Commissioners, provided it were approved by the King, but likewise whatever the King should enjoin for the future in matters of Religion, should be believed and obeyed by all his Subjects. This was investing the King with the infallibility taken from the Pope. Greater Signs of Slavery can hardly be seen, since the Parliament gave the King Power over Conscience, after having in a manner rendered him master of Life and Fortune. Moreover a Clause was inserted in this Act, which under colour of limiting the King's Authority sensibly enlarged it, namely, That nothing should be done or determined by virtue of this Act, which was contrary to the Laws of the Realm. These contradictory Clauses in the same Statute rendered the King Arbitrator of the lives of his Subjects, since on the one hand, they were enjoined to submit to the King's Will in matters of Religion, without knowing however what he would please to prescribe, and on the other, were forbid to do any thing contrary to the Laws. The Order of the Jesuits.

It was this year that the famous Jesuitical Order was founded by a Bull of Paul III, dated the 27th of Sep-tember (3).

Henry from nothing from the Emperor and Pope.

The uneasiness the Emperor had given Henry for some time, was now almost vanished, since Francis had been disappointed in the affair of Milan. Henry knew sufficiently that Prince's temper and character, to foresee without much difficulty, that he would soon break with the Emperor. A War between these two Monarchs could not but be advantageous to Henry. It would of course procure him quiet, and enable him to preserve an equality of power between them, which was the firmest foundation of his own and his Kingdom's security. So fearing nothing from the Pope or the Emperor, or the King of France, or his own Subjects, whose attempts must be in vain without a foreign aid, he confined himself wholly to his domestic affairs. He had chiefly two things in view. The first was, to preserve and even enlarge the authority he had acquired; the second, to take care that no alterations should be made in Religion, but such as he himself judged reasonable. These were the two affairs which wholly employed him. As he was positively bent upon these two points, and the Parliament durst not oppose his Will, it may be easily judged, that none of his Ministers had the courage to contradict him in any thing. So, it was himself alone that ordered every thing according to his fancy, his Council only approving his motions. However, there were in the Council, as well as in the Kingdom, two opposite Parties with respect to Religion. But every one had always his eyes upon the King, to try to discover his thoughts, for fear of combating his opinion.

He is absolute in his Kingdom.

Cranmer's Character. Burnet.

Audley's

The Duke of Norfolk's

Gardiner's

Archbishop Cranmer was at the head of the Party who wished for a greater Reformation. He was still very much esteemed by the King, especially on account of his integrity. But sincerity, which he professed, rendered him unfit for political affairs, in a Court where instead of hearkening to Reason, Justice and Equity, the King's inclination only was to be considered.

Chancellor Audley was a Person of good sense. He served the Reformers when he could without danger. But he was too much a Courtier to insist upon what he judged reasonable, if the King was against it.

The Duke of Norfolk was as eminent for his merit as for his birth. He was reckoned a good General, but was still a better Courtier. Ever submissive to the King's Will, he outwardly approved whatever he was pleased to command him. But in private, he grieved at all the late innovations in Religion, and could not endure either the Reformation or the Reformed. He would have been glad to see the King reconciled to the Pope; but the small hopes of their reconciliation made him very cautious how he offended for outgiving a Master. Nevertheless, as the King was not always in the same disposition, the Duke found frequent occasion to serve his Party, especially in the punishment of those who disliked the fix Articles, and were so hardy as publicly to show it. In a word, he was as head of the favourers of the Pope, and the old Religion. But he carefully concealed from the King his inclination for the former; and as for the latter, he showed his Zeal only in supporting what the King had retained.

Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, was in the same sentiments, and behaved in the same manner. But he was very far from being so much esteemed by the King, who made use of him however, because he was pliant and dextrous, and had an extensive knowledge of foreign affairs. As this knowledge rendered him of greater flight than the rest of the Ministers, he sometimes engaged the King in proceedings, the consequences whereof might be advantageous to his Party, and of which the King himself did not always know the motive. By a blind submission to the King's Will, he kept himself in some degree of favor, being convinced himself, and having also convinced his friends, that this compliance was the only means to procure a revocation of what had been done against the Pope.

Bonner Bishop of London, was also one of the heads of Bonner's the same Party, but however always ready to sacrifice every thing to his fortune. He was naturally bold, passionate, and exceedingly cruel, as he plainly showed upon many occasions. As he was of very little merit, his support himself by making Court to those who were in favour, and by taking the King's Will for the rule of his actions.

Queen Catherine blindly followed the directions of the Duke of Norfolk her Uncle, and used what power he had over the King, to support the credit of the enemies of the Reformation.

Such was the situation of the Court, when the King freed from his foreign affairs, was wholly employed in his domestic concerns. The Kingdom however was in profound tranquillity, because the terror with which People were seized, silenced all contradiction. In December the last year, he began the foundation of the new Bishopricks, by converting the Abby of Westminster into a Bishop's See (4). In this year 1541, he founded three more, Chester (5), Gloucester (6), and Peterborough (7), and the next year, Oxford (8), and Bristol (9). These foundations, and some others of little consequence, were the only charitable uses to which he applied the immense riches acquired by the suppression of the Abbies (10). His Courtiers magnified these pious Acts, whilst others took notice of the little proportion between seven or eight thousand pounds a year, employed in these uses, and what was acquired by the ruin of near seven hundred Religious Houses.

Mean while, Henry had a mind to show his zeal for Religion, as if his sole aim was to procure the eternal Salvation of his People. The Book of the Exposition of Christian Faith being printed, he prefixed an Ordinance, declaring all those to be Heretics, who believed more, or less than was contained in that Book (11). However, as it was not possible that all should conform to it, and it does not appear, any Person suffered upon that account in the course of this year, it is likely the King had intimated, that he desired not his ordinance to be rigorously executed.

Whilst Henry was congratulating himself upon triumphing over the Pope, and enjoying a tranquillity which the Court of Rome had in vain attempted to disturb, the eyes of all Europe were fixed upon what passed between the Emperor and the King of France, and upon the preparations in Turkey. The War between the Emperor and Francis was going to be renewed, but very unseasonably for the Emperor, when Saliman was preparing to invade Hungary, on occasion of the death of John de Zapol, Competitor of the King of the Romans. These two Princes, after long contending for the Crown of Hungary, being at last tired of War, were agreed that Zapol should hold, during his Life, what he possessed, with the title of King, but after his death the Crown should descend to Ferdinand. Zapol, dying and leaving a Son called Stephen, under the Guardianship of his Mother, Ferdinand expected that the Treaty should be executed,

The King does resolve to make a new Ordinance of Heretics.

Then he went to the University of Alcalá, and so to Salamanca, where being expelled and persecuted, he left all and came to Paris, and there studied till he had found divers others, with whom he agreed to return in Pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Daniel is a protestant, that in every Cathedral there should be Prebends, made by Richard of Devinity, and of Greek and Hebrew, and a great number of these to be each exercised in daily worship of God, and trained up in Study and Devotion, when the Bishop might transport out of the Sanctuary, and all the Parts of his Diocese. 1541. and would have taken possession of all Hungary. But young Zapla's Mother implor'd Soliman's protection, which he readily granted, intending to improve this disposition, to become master of Hungary, and penetrate afterwards into the imperial territories.

The Emperor seeing Hungary threatened with a powerful invasion, which might be of fatal consequence to Germany, used all his art to pacify the Protestants, without giving them however any satisfaction, endeavouring only to amuse them, and obtain some assistance against the Turk. On the other hand, he laboured to persuade Soliman, that he was in perfect union with the Kings of France and England, that the dread of a general League of the Christian Princes might divert him from his design. Wherefore, he tried to amuse Francis, with putting him in hopes, he would give the Low-Countries to his second Son, and erect them into a Kingdom. At the same time, he gave the Ottoman Port to understand, this affair was in a manner concluded. Francis fell not into the snare. But hearing from all parts, that the Emperor's Ministers every where gave out, the Negotiation was upon the point of conclusion, he resolved to send an Ambassador to Venice, and another to Constantinople, to undeceive the Emperor of the Turks and the Senate of Venice. He chose, for these Embassies, Rincon and Freyssa, who fate out in order to pass through Italy. But the Marquis of Guasto, Governor of Milan, receiving advice that they were to embark at Turin, and go down the Po, caused them to be so narrowly watched, that they were murdered in the Boat. Francis made great noise about this assassination; but the Emperor gave him no satisfaction. This was a fresh occasion of rupture between the two Monarchs.

About the same time, the Emperor called a Diet at Ratisbon for the 5th of April. As it was then no proper juncture to disturb the Protestants, the Diet resolved at last to grant them a second delay, which was called the Interim, that they might continue quiet, and more readily engage to furnish Supplies against the Turks.

In the mean time, the King of the Romans ordered Buda, Capital of Hungary, to be invested, in hopes of taking it before the Turks should arrive. But the Siege proving more difficult than was expected, the Turks had time to relieve it, and give the Germans battle, over whom they obtained a signal Victory. Shortly after, Soliman coming to Hungary, made his entry into Buda, and under colour of taking young Zapla under his protection, became master of the City, and great part of the Kingdom.

Mean while, the Emperor having ended the Diet, instead of marching into Hungary to assist the King his Brother, took the rout of Italy, and embarking at Portovenere with an Army of twenty thousand men, sailed for Africa, to make war upon Barbarossa, who had made himself King of Algiers. This proceeding gave occasion for many Speculations. It was ridiculed at the French Court, as if instead of fighting the Turks, he had sought a pretence to fly from them. But as the African expedition was projected the beginning of the year, and the Troops were now on the Coast of Italy, it is certain he would not have had time to relieve the King of the Romans, if he had attempted to march his Army into Hungary. However this be, he landed his Army near Algiers the 22d of October. But two days after, a sudden and violent storm destroyed part of his Fleet. This accident obliged him to re-embark the beginning of November, after having lost good part of his Troops and Ships. It is pretended, Francis out of mere Generosity would not proclaim War against him, whilst employed in this expedition. It is however difficult to believe that Francis, who actually held intelligence with Soliman, and afterwards scrupled not to make use of the assistance of the Turks, should stick at interrupting the Emperor's designs against the Infidels of Africa.

Henry saw with pleasure that the King of France and the Turks were going to find the Emperor employment, which would hinder him from thinking of England. But though he was easy in that respect, he was however in some pain with regard to the King of Scotland, who, though his Nephew, had no reason to love him, and could easily assist the English Male-contents, who were very numerous in the northern Counties. Henry was afraid also, that a religious zeal would carry that Prince to undertake something against him, because he began to suffer himself to be governed by the Churchmen, who under colour of persuading him to destroy Heresy, strongly attacked him to the Pope's interest. The Reformed had now been burned many years in Scotland. But these punishments caused there the same effects as elsewhere, that is, they increased, instead of lessening the number, and yet the Clergy were still obstinately bent to root them out with fire and sword. James V. was a Prince much addicted to his pleasures, and very greedy of Money. Besides, he had several natural Sons whom he could not enrich as he wished, because he had exhausted his Treasure in needless expences. There were two Parties in his Court, whereof the one favoured the King of England and the Reformed, and the other, chiefly consisting of Churchmen, was entirely against Henry, and continually strove to induce the King to extirpate all who swerved from the old Religion. The former endeavoured to persuade him to imitate the King of England his Uncle, and secure a large Revenue by the suppression of the Abbies. The latter represented to him, that by strictly executing the Laws against Heretics, he would raise by forfeited Estates above a hundred thousand Crowns a year. After some consideration, James closed with the last advice, and suffering the Clergy to take their own course, there followed in Scotland a violent persecution (1).

Henry perceiving the King his Nephew to be thus governed by Persons wholly addicted to the Court of Rome, feared, he would at last be led to unite against him with the Pope and Emperor. This apprehension seemed to him the more just, as he could hardly rely any longer on the assistance of the King of France, who was wont to direct the Court of Scotland, because that antient Ally was grown extremely cold to him. Whereupon, he resolved to use all his art to gain the King his Nephew, and persuade him to break, like him, with the Pope. To this end he sent Ambassadors to desire an Interview at York, not questioning, that, in an amicable conference, he should have eloquence enough to persuade him to what he pleased. James accepted the Overture, and promised to come to York, where Henry went and expected him. But the Scotch Ecclesiastics and their whole Party so befitted themselves, to prevent this Interview, the consequence whereof they perceived, that they succeeded at last, and prevailed with the King to find some pretence to be excused.

Mean while, Henry who knew nothing of this change, impatiently waited at York for the day appointed for the Interview. In this interval, he issued out a Proclamation, That all who had been aggrieved for want of justice, by any of his former Ministers, should come to him and his Council for redress. His aim was to throw all past mis-carriages on Cromwell, and put his Subjects, particularly the northern People, in hopes of better times (2). But whilst he was preparing for the King of Scotland's reception, he received Letters of excuse, that he could not have the honour of waiting upon him. He was extremely provoked, and this refusal, which he deemed an affront, soon after caused a breach between the two Kingdoms. But his vexation at this affair was not comparable to the unexpected affliction he met with upon his return to London.

Since his last marriage, he daily blessed God for the happiness he enjoyed with his Queen, and upon all occasions publicly testified his extreme satisfaction: Nay, during his journey to York, desiring to give God thanks in a manner suitable to the sentiments of his Heart, he ordered his Confessor (3) to draw up a particular Thanksgiving, and prayed him to join with him in the fame. All this showed his esteem and tender affection for the Queen, who seemed to have the same fondness for him. But when he came to London, he heard things which it would have been well for him never to have known. Whilst he was at York, one John Lassels came to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who remained at London, and told him, that his Sister, an old Servant of the Duchess Dowager of Norfolk [under whose care the Queen was brought up,] said to him, that the Queen had been very lewd before and since her Marriage, and that two Men, among others, namely, Dirham and Mannock (4), had often enjoyed her. (1) George Buchanan, the famous Scot's Historian, was in danger at this time, and would have died with the rest, had not he escaped out of Prison. See his History of Scotland, l. 14. The sharpness of his poems against the Clergy was the cause of his Confinement. He went beyond Seas, and lived twenty Years in Exile, and was forced to teach School most part of the Time. In his Writings there appears not only all the Beauty and Grace of the Latin Tongue, but a great Vigour of Mind and Outbreaks of Thought. His Style is so natural and nervous, and his Reflections on Things are so solid, belies his immortal poems that he is justly filled the best of our modern Authors. Burnet, Tom. 1. p. 211.

1542. the Pope would interpose, necessarily be to his prejudice; nay, it was a question whether it would not occasion a League against him, and the King of Scotland, in it. In that case, England could be invaded in the North with the more ease, as the northern Counties were most inclined to rebel. It was therefore of very great consequence to Henry to gain the King of Scotland to his interest, since, being secured from that side, an invasion was not to be much feared, which he looked upon as impossible, considering the superiority of his naval Forces.

He intended to make use of two ways to gain the King of Scotland in the proposed Conference. The first way was, to shew him that it was in his power to secure to him the Succession of the Crown of England, after his Son Edward, or remove him from it, since, by the Act of Parliament made for that purpose, he could call to the Succession his Daughters Mary and Elizabeth, or exclude them for ever. In the former case, King James could not pretend to the Crown, till after the Possibility of these two Princesses was extinct; but in the latter case, he came immediately after Prince Edward. As therefore to gain two degrees, was a considerable Advantage for the King of Scotland, Henry hoped he would not be so unwise as to flight it. The second way he designed to make use of to win that Prince, was to lay before him the advantages which would accrue to him in case he renounced the Pope, as well by reason of the facility this would give him, to succeed to the Crown of England, if there should be occasion, as by the Riches he would acquire in suppressing the Monasteries of Scotland. As James was very greedy of Money, Henry did not question succeeding by this second means, though the first should prove ineffectual. He was therefore extremely vexed to see himself disappointed of his hopes, by the King his Nephew's refusal to meet him at York. He found, the new Queen had too great an Influence over him, and even suspected it to be the effect of the Intrigues of the Pope, the Emperor, and perhaps the King of France. So, despairing to succeed in his Project, by fair means, he resolved to try to accomplish it by force.

Scotland was little able to resist England, without the assistance of France. But Francis was so employed, that there was no likelihood of his interposing in the quarrel. Henry hoped therefore, if he could gain at first some advantage, he should render the Scots less intractable, and more easily dispose the King his Nephew to hearken to his Proposals. Thus the War he intended to wage with Scotland, was properly designed to oblige the Scots to a compliance with his desires, and not founded upon Caprice only, or to be revenged of the Affront he received, as the Historians pretend. However, as he could not discover the real Motives, without doing himself a prejudice, he pretended a violation of the Truce, James's denial of some Lands of small value lying on the Frontiers, and his reception of some English Rebels. But as all this was not very capable of deceiving the world, he bethought himself of reviving the old pretensions of the Kings of England to the Sovereignty of Scotland. To that purpose, he set out a long Declaration, in which was inserted the Memorial largely spoken of in the Reigns of Edward I, and Henry VII, containing the pretended Proofs of the Homage, Scotland had formerly paid to England. This Declaration was however so ambiguously expressed, that it plainly appeared, Henry was willing to have it in his power to quit his pretensions without injury his honour. It is entirely needless to repeat the contents of the Memorial. It will suffice to observe, that the English Writers speak of it, as if the Sovereignty of the Kings of England over Scotland was there demonstrated, and the bare Citation of it sufficient to carry the Cause. Doctor Burnet, though a Scotchman, seems to give into this opinion universally spread in England, since he speaks of this Memorial in his History of the Reformation, without making any Remarks. Perhaps he did not think proper to combat the Sentiments of the English without any necessity, in respect to his History.

Henry published not his Declaration till his Army was just entering Scotland. His design was to surprize the Scots, which he believed the more easy, as there appeared to be no just cause of Breach between the two Kingdoms. However, King James hearing that Soldiers were raising in England, put himself in a posture of defence, in case he should be attacked. In the mean while, he sent two Ambassadors (1) to the King his Uncle, to see to content him, if possible, or at least to gain time till the King of France could assist him. These Ambassadors were long detained at the Court of England upon frivolous pretences, and whilst Henry was making his Preparations, he gave them no answer. Nay, they were not suffered to return but with the Army, which was to enter their Country, under the command of the Duke of Norfolk (2), and where they were as Prisoners. Two other Ambassadors of Scotland who were going to London, meeting the English upon their march, were also detained till the Army arrived at Berwick.

Mean while, King James hearing the Duke of Norfolk was marching towards the North at the head of twenty thousand Men, sent a Body of ten thousand to the Frontiers, under the command of George Gordon, expecting the rest of the Troops, who were marching from several parts to join him. But Gordon could not hinder the Duke of Norfolk from entering Scotland about the end of October (3), and ravaging the Country North of the Tweed. After this short Expedition, the English Army retired to Berwick, the Season which was now very bad, preventing them from advancing any farther. In the mean time, King James ordered the Lord Maxwell to march with fifteen thousand Men, whilst the English were retiring to Berwick. The Scots pretend, upon the news of Maxwell's march, the English retired in such confusion, that they might have been easily defeated, if Gordon had ventured to attack them, and that the King was extremely angry with him for this disappointment. However this be, James heading his Army in person, held a Council of War, and appeared fully resolved to give Battle, let what would be the consequence. But he was alone of that opinion. On the contrary, the danger to which the Kingdom would be exposed, in case of a defeat, was strongly represented to him. In short, as he would not alter his resolution, the Generals and Nobles told him, they would not obey him, if, without any necessity, he obstinately exposed the Kingdom to so manifest a hazard. This opposition threw him into a fury. He swore he would punish their disobedience, and called them all Traitors, which they hindered him from obtaining, as he thought, a certain Victory. Cardinal Beaton inspired him with this notion, by telling him, it was impossible for such Heretics as the English to conquer him. The truth is, James was a little disturbed in his fancy, ever since he had unjustly put to death a Nephew of the Duke of Albany, whose Apparition was ever present to his Imagination. So being extremely troubled to be thus disobeyed, he left the command of the Army to the Lord Maxwell, with orders to march towards the Enemy, and remained himself within distance to join him, in case there was occasion to fight. But a few days after, as he was extremely incensed with his Generals, and greatly mistrusted them, he gave a Commission in form to Oliver Sinclair his Minion, to command the Army. The new General, very unfit for such a Post, repairing to the Camp, caused his Patent to be publicly read, at which all were offended. This bred such discontent among the Troops, that they began to disband, when a Body of five hundred English Horse appeared on a hill, where they were posted to watch the motions of the Enemy. This sight increased the confusion among the Scotch Troops, who imagined the whole English Army was approaching to give Battle. In this condition, being without a General, since Maxwell's Commission was revoked, and none would obey Sinclair, they chose to retire in a fright, which permitted them not to look back, and observe the small number of their Enemies. The English Horse seeing them fly with such precipitation, closely pursued them, and without meeting any resistance, slew great numbers, took Prisoners: eleven Lords, two hundred Gentlemen, eight hundred Soldiers, with four and twenty pieces of Ordnance (4). Never was Victory so easily won. Among the chief Prisoners were the Earls of Glencairn and Cessils, the Lords Maxwell, (Somerville, Oliphant, Grays,) and Oliver Sinclair the King's Favorite.

The news of this Rout threw King James into a dismal melancholy, to which he was already too much inclined. He fancied, his Generals and Nobles had betrayed him, and in this belief, resolved to put most of them to death. His vexation was still increased, upon hearing that a Herald, sent by the Duke of Norfolk, was murdered by an English Refugee. He immediately apprehended the ill consequences of such an accident, after his late misfortune. So imagining it would be impossible to free himself from his present embarrassment, he could not withstand his immoderate Grief, which brought him to his grave the 14th of December 1542. His death happened eleven days after the birth of a Princess called Mary, of whom his Queen Henry not knowing what passed in Scotland, had ordered the Scotch Prisoners to be brought to London, where they arrived the nineteenth of December (1). Next day (2) they were conducted thro' the City from the Tower, where they had been confined, to Westminster, where the King was pleased to see and talk with them. He expostulated with them, for having, by their pernicious Counsels, persuaded their King to quarrel with him, and told them they justly bore the punishment of a war raised by themselves. Nevertheless, as he intended to make use of them to procure such a peace as he desired, he ended his discourse with some obliging expressions, and granted them more liberty, by putting them in the Custody of several Noblemen. The Earl of Goffin had the good fortune to fall into the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and to receive from him, during his short stay at London, such Instructions as induced him to embrace the Reformation when he returned to his own Country.

A few days after (3), the news of the Birth of Mary Princess of Scotland, and of the King her Father's death arriving together, Henry thought it a favourable juncture to unite Scotland to England, by marrying his Son Edward to the new Queen of Scotland. He cauled the captive Lords to be founded, and finding them inclined to second the overture, set them at liberty, on condition they would give hostages for their return, in case the project of the Marriage did not succeed. This condition being accepted, they were conducted to Newcastle, from whence they returned into their country. We shall see presently what was the issue of this project.

The Parliament of England meeting the twenty second of January, granted the King a Subsidy (4), as well for his charges in the War with Scotland, as for his other occasions. By that was meant, a War with France, of which there was no longer room to doubt, since the King was upon the point of concluding a League with the Emperor. The Union which was going to be formed between the two Monarchs, was like to be so favourable to the Adherents of Rome and the old Religion, that they questioned not but the destruction of the Reformation in England was approaching. However, at this very time they had the mortification to see an Act of Parliament passed, which much checked their hopes. This Act, moved, and at length obtained by Crammer, ran, That Lords, Gentlemen, Merchants, might have in their Houses an English Bible, with some other religious Books, mentioned in the Act, for the Instruction of their Families. But it was expressly forbid to print, sell, buy, or keep any other religious Books, and to preach or speak against the Ordinance of the Year 1540. There was also a very considerable Clause in this Statute, that the offenders, if Ecclesiasticks, should not be condemned to be burnt till the third offence; and the punishment of the Laity, not extend beyond forfeiture of Goods and Chattels [and perpetual Imprisonment.] Moreover, the Act allowed the Party accused to bring Witnesses for his own purgation, which had never been practised before in the case of Heresy. Lastly,
It was enacted, that the accused should be tried within a year at farthest after the Indictment. But on the other hand, the Law of the six Articles was confirmed, and the Parliament left it in the King's power to annul or alter the Act at his pleasure. By this last Clause the King still continued to be master of the Lives of the Reformed, since by repealing this Act, he could prosecute them upon the former Statutes (5).

A fortnight after the Parliament broke up, Henry concluded with the Emperor a League, which however was not published till June. It was not the Interest of England, that the King should join with the Emperor to render him more powerful. He was already too potent. On the contrary, it would have been much more proper, in order to keep the balance even, to have allied France. At least, it is undeniable, that a Neutrality would have been advantageous to the English. But the King's passion ran counter to the Nation's Interest. He was extremely diffatisfied with Francis upon several accounts. In the first place, he observed in him a great Indifference for his concerns, ever since he had not wanted his assistance. Secondly, He perceived at length, that all his promises to renounce, like him, the Papal Authority, tended only to amuse him. He knew, Francis on several occasions, had blamed his Conduct with respect to Religion, and ridiculed his Marriages. In the next place, he paid neither the yearly penion of a hundred thousand Crowns, nor that of ten thousand for the Salt of Bronage, though bound by divers Treaties. As for the debt of two Millions, Francis indeed could produce Acquittances for good part of that Sum, but then Henry had received no Money, the Acquittances being in lieu of the Succours he had voluntarily promised to lend him in his former Wars. However, there was a round Sum still left unpaid, and the Debtor never endeavoured to satisfy him. Moreover, Henry had presented the King of France with what was due to him from the Emperor, solely on condition he would perform the Treaties, and complained, Francis had not been punctual. But what most offended Henry, was the obstacles Francis had raised him in Scotland, by means of a Faction, which openly opposed his designs. Here was sufficient cause for a Breach, if the Nation's Interest had been the fame with the King's. But in such an opposition, seldom does it happen that the People's advantage prevails over the Sovereign's. Henry resolved therefore to make the King of France lenible, that it was worth his while to have shewn a greater regard for him, and to this end, chose to be reconciled with the Emperor, and join in a League with him.

Charles V. desired nothing more earnestly. He plainly ⁷ The advantages of this League on the side of the Emperor's father. brought the King of England to reason, and dectroy all his hopes of recovering Millan by Arms. His constant fear of Henry's uniting with France and the German Protestants, caused him to consider the alliance with England as what would enable him to accomplish his ambitious designs. He found his account much better in hindering Francis from setting foot again in Italy, and in subduing the Protestants, than in executing, or rather in trying to execute the Pope's sentence against Henry; an undertaking which, probably, would not have ended to his honour. Besides, the death of Queen Catherine his Aunt had much lessened, and it may be entirely stifled, his desire to revenge her. So, at the very time he was complaining to all the Princes of Europe that Francis held private intelligence with the Infidels, he scrupled not to court the alliance of an excommunicated King, who, according to the principles of the Romish Church, ought not to have been looked upon with less horror than the Turk. One single difficulty retarded the conclusion of this alliance. The Emperor would have ^{D. finally} Mary Queen Catherine's Daughter, acknowledged for legitimate, which Henry obstinately refused. Nay, he could not grant it without condemning his Divorce with Catherine, and all his proceedings upon that occasion. He promised however, that pursuant to the power granted him by Parliament, he would give Mary a place in the succession; but would never consent, this Article should be inserted in the Treaty. The Emperor's friends in England advised him to be satisfied with this verbal promise, apprehensive as they were that the League, from whence they expected great advantages, would be delayed by this obstacle. ^{D. finally} Bonner Bishop of London, who had been sent into Spain for this Negotiation, willingly and ardently endeavoured to accomplish it, in hopes, that an Union between the Emperor and the King, would re-establish Religion in England upon the same foot as before the Divorce.

That he should cause the Town of Maran, taken by the Turks, to be restored to King Ferdinand; and to the aid of twelve French Gallies. That he should repair the losses the German had sustained by the Turkish invasion. Lastly, that he should satisfy the King of England for whatever he owed him, and give him security for the payment of the hundred thousand Crowns.

After these preliminaries, the two confederate Monarchs agreed, that they would not make Peace or Truce but upon these conditions: That Francis should pay the King of England whatever was due to him, and for security of the annual Pension, surrender into his hands the Earldom of Ponthieu, Baugne, Montreuil, Ardes and Teroenne, free from all Homage, for which however Henry should consent that the yearly Revenues thence arising should be in lieu of the pension. Moreover, that Francis should restore to the Emperor the Duchy of Burgundy.

That if the King of France should delay but ten days to accept these conditions, the two confederate Monarchs should proclaim War against him, with a Declaration that they would never make Peace, till the King of England was in possession of Normandy, Guaine, and the Kingdom of France, and the Emperor of Ambouille, Amiens, Bray, Corbeil, Peronne, Ham, St. Quintin, and the whole Duchy of Burgundy.

Lastly, They agreed, that each should take the Field, and invade France with twenty-five thousand Men, of whom five thousand should be Cavalry (1).

These were vast projects. But these Princes were too wise to imagine, that with twenty-five thousand Men each, they were able to conquer France. It is likely therefore, they agreed in the Treaty, to bring into the Field so small a number of Troops, only to invade France to make preparations accordingly. And indeed we shall see hereafter, that they invaded France with above a hundred thousand Men.

Henry's chief aim.

One of the chief reasons why Henry joined in a League with the Emperor, was to find the King of France so much employment at home, that it should not be in his power to break his measures for the Union of Scotland with England, by a Marriage between Mary and Prince Edward. Henry had this affair extremely at heart, and very justly, as it is easy to imagine. But unhappy for him, there was a Queen Dowager in Scotland of the House of Lorraine, and a Cardinal Archbishop of St. Andrews, who being both devoted to France and the Pope, laboured with all their power to defeat his projects. As the affairs of Scotland will be very soon intermixt with those of England, it is absolutely necessary to see what passed in that Country, after the death of James V. without which it would be very difficult to understand what will be said hereafter.

Affairs of Scotland.
Buchanan.
Burnet.

After the decease of James V. Scotland was in a very ill situation. The late King had not settled the Regency during his Daughter's minority. The next Heir to Mary, was James Hamilton Earl of Arran, a Person of a very mean genius, a lover of Books and ease, but little capable of managing the publick affairs, and still less those of War (2). He had shewn some inclination for the new Religion, and thereby rendered himself as much suspected and odious to the Clergy, as agreeable to those who had embraced the Reformation. The Queen Dowager, Sister to the Cardinal of Lorraine and the Duke of Guise, had an extreme aversion to the Reformed. This aversion was cherished by Cardinal Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, a violent and cruel Man, who had already given several proofs of his barbarous temper towards those who embraced the new Religion. Most of the Lords who, by their Counsels, could have supported the State in such a juncture, were either slain in the late rout, or in the hands of the English. But tho' they had been alive, or in Scotland, it would have been very difficult to succeed. There had long been such a division among the Nobles, that what one moved was sure to be opposed by another. This was the consequence of the Factions raised by the Kings of France and England in the Kingdom, and which were continued by different opinions in Religion. To all these evils was added that of a War against a powerful Neighbour, who had just gained a very considerable advantage, and could easily improve the conformation, all Scotland was under.

Amidst this confusion, Cardinal Beaton seeing none able to withstand him, formed the design of seizing the Regency. To this end, he forged a Will for the late King, wherein he was appointed Regent or Vice-roy during Mary's minority, with three Counsellors or Assistants, of whom the Earl of Arran was one, and caused it to be published till the Parliament should meet and confirm it. Mean while, he strove by all sorts of ways to gain proper Persons to support him, as well among the People, as among the great Men. The Queen Dowager was the first that declared for him.

But whilst the Cardinal was labouring to strengthen his Party, the friends and relations of the Earl of Arran were earnestly solliciting him, not to yield the Regency to one who had no right to it. They represented to him, That the Will on which the Cardinal grounded his pretensions, was a forgery, because the late King never valued him so as to commit the Regency to him, to the prejudice of the Princes of the Blood: That it was a contrivance to destroy the Hamiltons with their whole party, and hinder the progress of the Reformation: That the Cardinal was known to be a Man of ill Principles, of little or no conscience, cruel, and superstitious, and if once he had the power in his hands, the flames of persecution would quickly be kindled all over the Kingdom, not only against the Reformed, but against all in general who would not blindly submit to his orders, that infallibly the Princes of the Blood, and the chief of the Nobles would be first sacrificed to his ambition and jealousy. The Earl of Arran was of a peaceable temper, and without ambition. If he had followed his own inclination, he would have left the Cardinal quietly to enjoy the authority he had usurped. But his friends having in a manner forced him by their remonstrances, to prosecute the right due to his birth, he resolved to demand the Regency, and shew the forgery of the pretended Will, on which the Cardinal rested.

Whilst these things were transacting, the Prisoners, who had been released, came to Scotland, and with them Archibald Douglas Earl of Angus, and William Douglas his Brother, who had been fifteen years exiles in England. By their arrival, the Earl of Arran's Party was considerably strengthened, whereas the Cardinal lost many followers, who had joined with him more out of fear than affection. It was publicly said, that the Earl of Arran's right was indisputable, though the King had capriciously disposed of the Regency in favor of the Cardinal, which however was incredible. The Parliament meeting in March, the Will was examined, and the forgery being detected, the Cardinal was removed, and the Earl of Arran declared Regent with almost unanimous consent. It was not without reason that most of the Lords and Nobles were desirous to free themselves from the dominion of Cardinal Beaton. Before the Parliament met, a paper was found written with the King's own hand, wherein were set down the names of three hundred Lords and Gentlemen, whom he had resolved to dispatch. As most of these proscribed Persons were of the Reformed Religion, or favored the Reformation, it was not doubted, that the Cardinal had greatly contributed to put the King upon this barbarous resolution, by representing to him, that those who had refused to fight against the English, were secret friends of the King of England, and favorers of the new opinions. It is certain, many of the Nobility were of the Reformed Religion, or well-wishers to the Reformation. The Earl of Arran was of this number, and upon that account was so well supported when he demanded the Regency, because those of the new Religion intended to make him their Protector. But this was an ill choice, the Earl's unactive and timorous temper rendering him very unfit to support the Party who put themselves under his protection.

Whilst the Parliament was sitting, Henry sent an Ambassador (3) to Scotland, to propose the Marriage of the Prince Edward his Son with the young Queen, according to the agreement with the captive Lords. The Ambassador was furnished with a good sum of Money to facilitate the Negotiation, Henry knowing by experience how effectual that means was in Scotland. The Queen and Cardinal Beaton used all their credit and address to cause the overture to be rejected. But as their Party was too weak to balance the King of England's, the Cardinal made it his business to confound all the conferences held upon this occasion, by long Speeches, affected Disputes, Invectives against the contrary Party, with design to raise quarrels, which would obstruct the conclusion of this affair. His artifices being at last perceived, he was confined to a room till the debates were ended. The moment the Cardinal no longer appeared, the King of England's proposal was accepted without much difficulty, and the Parliament appointed Ambassadors to go and treat at London with the King, concerning a Peace and the Mar-1543. George Douglas, the Earl of Angus's Brother; and some other Lords (1) were charged with this Negotiation, which ended at length in two Treaties concluded at London the 1st of July 1543. The first was to settle a good and firm Peace between the two Kingdoms. The second, for the Marriage of Prince Edward with the young Queen of Scotland. Henry did all he could to have Mary put into his hands. But the Scottish Ambassadors not consenting, it was at last agreed, she should not be brought into England till she was ten years of age: That in the mean time the Parliament of Scotland should appoint four Lords (2) to take care of her education, and Henry might add a fifth of his own Nation to convey his advices to the Governors (3): That the Parliament of Scotland should give the King six Hostages of distinction, for security that the Marriage should be consummated.

Buchanan.

This affair being ended, the Cardinal had a little more liberty granted him, by being given in custody to the Lord Sutton. But that Lord suffering himself to be corrupted by his Prisoner, afforded him means to make his escape. As soon as he was at liberty, he used all his art to break the Treaties with England, wherein he was powerfully assisted by the Queen Dowager. As they were both firmly attached to France and the old Religion, they could not see, without extreme grief, the alliance lately concluded with a Prince whom they looked upon as a Heretic, and whose interests had for some time been contrary to those of Francis I. They plainly perceived, this alliance was capable of producing great alterations as well in Church as State; and would infallibly destroy the ancient union between France and Scotland. To prevent this, the Cardinal assembled at his House the heads of the Clergy, and representing to them that Religion was in danger, he obtained a large contribution to assist him to support it. This Money served him to maintain his Creatures, and gain some of the contrary Party. In a word, he so well caballed, that he quickly put things in extreme confusion. By his solicitations and intrigues he so managed, that the Prisoners who had been released resolved not to go and redeem their Hostages. The Earl of Cassilis alone could not be prevailed with upon any consideration to break his Word. In short, the Cardinal's Party being grown very numerous by his liberalities, strongly opposed the sending of the Hostages promised to the King of England by the Treaty. Besides this, the Cardinal resolving at any rate, to fit the two Nations at variance, caused the English Ambassador to be highly affronted by some of his Party, and his Servants to be insulted. But the Ambassador knowing how desirous the King his Master was, that the Treaties should be executed, bore all with patience, for fear of raising an unseasonable quarrel, which he saw to be the Cardinal's design. Thus the Cardinal had brought things to such a pass, that the Regent, who wanted resolution, tried in vain to stop these violent proceedings, since his commands were openly disobeyed.

At last, the day being come that the three Hostages were to be delivered, the English Ambassador demanded them of the Regent, complaining withal of the Affronts he had received. The Regent told him, "he was very sorry that any disrespect had been shewn to his Person and Character, and would give him, at a more convenient season, what satisfaction he desired, but at present it was no proper juncture. That he was himself witness of the troubles raised by the Cardinal, and how contemptible the authority of the Government was rendered by that Prelate's Cabals: As for the Hostages, it was no longer in his power to put them into his hands, since the Cardinal and his whole party were against it, who were now grown too strong to be compelled." The Ambassador was sufficiently convinced of the truth of what the Regent said; and as he saw little appearance of a change in favour of the King his Master, he contented himself with summoning the Prisoners to return to England, according to their promise. But in that he succeeded no better. They refused to return, tho' they were released only upon Parole. The Earl of Cassilis (4) alone, abhorring the perfidiousness of his Fellow-Prisoners, set out for London, and put himself into the King's hands. This action met with its due reward. Henry very civilly received the Earl. He commended his Faithfulness, and making him rich presents, dismissed him without ransom. Mean while, finding his party in Scotland was neither very strong, nor firm enough to his interest, he resolved to proclaim war with that Kingdom. He might easily have subdued it some Months before, if he would have taken advantage of the confirmation of the Sen, after their defeat and the death of their Sovereign.

The Queen and the Cardinal having accomplished their enterprise, with respect to a rupture with England, confided of means to procure the Government of the Kingdom, by supplanting the Earl of Arran, Head of the contrary Faction. Indeed, they did not much fear the Earl, as they had lately shewn. But he bore the title of Regent, and very possibly, by the counsels of the able men of his party, and the King of England's assistance, he might find means in the end to make himself formidable. The war Henry had just proclaimed against Scotland afforded them an opportunity to execute their project. They represented to the King of France, "That it was almost impossible for Scotland to maintain a war against England, without a powerful aid from him: That the Earl of Arran, Regent of the Kingdom, favoured the English; and, instead of opposing them, would certainly make use of them to establish his Authority, and complete the Queen's projected marriage: That probably, this Marriage would break the old Alliance between France and Scotland, and produce a strict union between Scotland and England: That he might plainly see how much he was himself concerned in a war, which, as it would infallibly be unsuccessful, would cause him to lose Scotland: That indeed they perceived how difficult it was for him to assist them, when he wanted all his forces against the Emperor; but they had devised an expedient to gain time, in breaking the measures of the contrary party. The expedient was, that he should send over Matthew Stuart Earl of Lenox who was in France, that they might oppose him to the Hamiltons, whose sworn Enemy he was, because they had killed his Father: That this Lord being in Scotland, would be immediately acknowledged for Head of the party against the Regent, and by the assistance they were ready to send him, would become so superior, that it would not be possible for the Regent to execute his designs in favor of England." The better to persuade the Earl of Lenox to come to Scotland, they put him in hopes of marrying the Queen Dowager, and of being placed on the Throne in case the young Queen died before she was married. They told him, this would be so much the easier, as before the Birth of Mary, the late King had designed him for his Successor, though farther removed than the Earl of Arran, because he looked upon this last as a Bastard, by reason of the unlawfulness of his Father's marriage. These remonstrances had the desired effect. Francis I, glad to strengthen his party in Scotland, without being forced to send great Supplies, sent away the Earl of Lenox with all speed, promising him his protection.

Mean while, the Regent having some notice of this project, resolved to support himself, by becoming master of the Queen's person, then in the Castle of Linlithgow (5). But as he was not secret enough, the Cardinal, who was informed of it, came to Linlithgow, well attended, in order to hinder the Queen's removal. Shortly after, the Earl of Lenox arrived from France, and after saluting the Regent, withdrew to his own House, where he assembled his Friends, to consult with them what was to be done. He acquainted them with the motives of his return, and the hopes given him of being put in possession of the Regency, the Queen-Mother, and the Throne, if the young Queen happened to die. The Friends he consulted, being all Enemies to the Regent, they unanimously advised him to improve the present opportunity, and each made him an offer of his Person, his Estate, his Vassals, and his Friends. So the Earl being determined to pursue his point, drew together four thousand Men, and putting himself at their head, came to the Queen, under colour of guarding her against the attempts of the Regent, for fear she should be delivered to the enemies of the Kingdom. Indeed, the Earl of Arran had resolved to secure her, nay, was preparing to execute his design. But when he found himself prevented, and considered the Queen could not be got out of the hands of the Earl of Lenox, without coming to an open war, he sent to treat of an Agreement. Lenox consented, on condition the Queen should for the future be educated in Sterling Castle, and four neutral Lords, whom both Parties could equally trust, appointed to guard her, and take care of her Education. The four Lords (6) being chosen 1543. and approved of, the Queen was removed to Sterling Castle, where, a few days after (1), she was crowned.

The Regent feeling the Party of his Enemies daily gathered strength, believed himself unable to withstand the storm which was forming against him. So, his courage and resolution failing him when most wanted, he chose to give way to the torrent, rather than strive in vain, as he thought, to resist it. Perwaded as he was, that he should be too weak to oppose the Queen-Mother and the Cardinal, he believed he ought to alter his measures, and strictly unite with them. But even here he met with difficulties, which he could not surmount, without acting against his Conscience. He had hitherto almost openly professed the new Religion. But the Queen and the Cardinal, as they could not resolve to be reconciled to him, so long as he was engaged in the Party of the Reformed, managed him so well, that at last they perwaded him to abjure, in the Church of the Franciscans at Sterling. By this action he lost all his old Friends, and was reduced to depend upon the contrary Party, with whom the Cardinal had more power than himself. From thenceforward he was wholly guided by the Counsels of that Prelate, who was the true Regent, whilst the Earl, that bore the name, was only the shadow.

When the Queen and the Cardinal were possessed of the Government, they were at a loss about the Earl of Lennox, to whom they were no longer willing to perform their promise. So, their chief care was to be rid of this Lord, who greatly embarrassed them. They agreed therefore to delire the King of France to recall him, and whilst an answer was expected, the Queen should continue to cherish his hopes, but whilst should use sundry Artifices to put off her Marriage, concerning which he began to be very urgent with her. This Project was executed as it had been resolved. The Queen for some time amused her Lover, who, not suspecting what was contriving against him, spent his time in procuring her Diversions, imagining, that would hasten his Marriage; but the Queen still found some fresh excuse to defer it. This Behaviour at last bred in him suspicions, which were confirmed by some Friend of greater penetration, or better informed than himself. He heard, the Queen and the Cardinal had writ to the Court of France, that nothing could be more prejudicial to the King's Interest, than his stay in Scotland, since they had gained the Regent to their side.

Lennox was so provoked at being thus mock'd, that he swore to be revenged, and without taking leave of the Queen and the Cardinal, retired to Dunbarton. In the mean while, Francis, who was not yet informed of the alterations in Scotland, sent thirty thousand Crowns to the Earl of Lennox, to be distributed among those of the Party, or to gain some of their Adversaries. By these means the Court of France had long maintained a Faction in Scotland, whilst the Court of England opposed her by the same methods. This Money arriving when Lennox was at Dunbarton, he sent part to the Lords who had the care of the young Queen, and gave some to his own Friends. But the Cardinal had none, though he had flattered himself with having the best share, and expected it with impatience. He was so very angry, that he perwaded the Regent to raise an Army and surprize Glasgow, where Lennox was retired with his Money. The Preparations which were making at Court, though under other pretences, giving the Earl of Lennox suspicion they were designed against him, he resolved to put himself in a posture of defence. It was not difficult for him to draw Forces together. The Cardinal had many Enemies, and the Regent had lost his Friends, since they had been forsaken by him. So, the Regent's Levies were made very slowly, whilst the Earl's visibly increased. Within a few days, he raised ten thousand Men, and sent the Cardinal word (2), he would save him the trouble of coming to Glasgow. The Cardinal received this Defiance with a seeming contempt, and pretended to pursue his Enterprize. But it was not his intention to come to a battle. He did not sufficiently rely on the Regent's Experience, who was no Warrior. Besides, he foresaw, that by prolonging the time, he should oblige his Enemy to diminish his Troops, because he wanted wherewithal to keep them long on foot.

What the Cardinal had foreseen came to pass. The Earl of Lennox finding himself destitute of Money, and seeing the defection was great in his Army, was forced at last to accept a Peace that was offered him. He came to Edinburgh, where he was outwardly reconciled with the Regent and the Cardinal; after which they went together to Sterling. But a few days after, having notice that the Court had designs against him, he privately withdrew, and returning to Glasgow, furnished the Bishop's Palace with a Garrison and Ammunition, and shut himself up in Dunbarton. There he was informed, that the King of France had been to pray for assistance against him, that there was no hope of obtaining his assistance for the future. Such was the situation of the affairs of Scotland, when Henry resolved to renew the war against that Kingdom. We must now see what passed in England.

In July, Henry married his sixth Wife, the Lady Catherine Parr (3), Widow of John North Lord Latimer, verifying what was only said in raillery, upon the Act passed in 1541, that the King must marry a Widow. The new Queen was a favorer of the Reformed. But she was to proceed with great caution, not to offend a Husband, whose absolute Will it was, that none should believe, but what was believed by himself. For this reason she durst not, just after her Marriage, intercede for three Protestants who were burnt at Winchester (4), at the instigation of Gardiner Bishop of Winchester. This Prelate never missed an opportunity to exasperate the King against those who refused to submit to the Act of the six Articles. But he showed not the same zeal against those who were still attached to the Pope. This affair however went farther than he desired, since it occasioned the discovery of a Plot, formed to ruin several Families at Winster, upon false accusations. The King was so offended at these diabolical practices, that he would have the affair thoroughly examined. The issue was, that the contrivers of the Plot (5) were carried on Horseback, with their faces to the Horse-tails, and then set in the Pillory. 'Tis said, Gardiner had a great share in this Project. But he was a very crafty Man, who knew how to conceal the hand that gave the blow, when he thought it dangerous to show it.

It was easy for the enemies of the Reformation to perceive, that Cranmer most obstructed the execution of their designs, and they should never succeed so long as he was in favour with the King. Whereupon they resolved to apply themselves before all things to his destruction, after which, they imagined, the ruin of his whole Party would follow of course. There were in this undertaking two contrary things, whereof one seemed to promise good success, and the other rendered the execution very difficult. The first was, the King seemed fully bent not to spare those who were called Heretics, that is, those who did not entirely conform themselves to the Declaration of Faith lately published. Now every one knew the Archbishop was of this number, though he used great caution not to give his enemies any advantage either by word or deed. The second was, the King's singular esteem for the Archbishop, against whom several unsuccessful attempts had been made. Notwithstanding this, his enemies thought, if they could convince the King, that Cranmer's opinions were very different from his, it would in some measure incense him. After that, they hoped the King would require of him, as of the rest of his Subjects, a blind submission, and that Cranmer's opposition, would destroy the King's affection for him. The business therefore was to inspire the King with suspicions, which should induce him to examine what were the Archbishop's opinions upon Religion. To this end, no occasion was lost to hint to the King, that it was in vain to punish Heretics whilst their chief supporters were suffered to live unmolested. Henry perceiving Cranmer was aimed at, made no answer. He hoped, his silence would demonstrate, it was in vain to try to incense him against that Prelate. But at last these insinuations were so often repeated, that he seemed to give ear to them, in order to know their intent. He hearkened therefore to whatever was said against Cranmer, and desired to have the intended Articles of accusation, with the names of his accusers. The Duke of Norfolk, the Bishop of Winchester, and their Party, believed the Archbishop ruined, since the King was pleased to examine his conduct. But they took care not to make themselves Parties, their design being to appear 'unconcerned, to strike the lurer. They caused therefore the accusation to be drawn by some Prebendaries of Canterbury, and certain Kentish Justices of the Peace, whom they perwaded to be his accusers. The Articles being put into the King's hands, he went in his Barge to Lambeth, the 1543. Archbishop's Palace on the other side of the Thames. Cranmer hearing the King was coming, hastened down to his Stairs to receive him, and by his order went into the Barge. When the King was alone with him, he lamented the growth of Heresy in the Kingdom, and told him, he was endeavouring to find out the chief encouragers of it, to punish them according to the utmost rigour of the Law, about which he was come to ask his opinion. Cranmer answered without any concern, that his zeal was laudable; but intreated him for God's sake to consider well what Heresy was, least, instead of punishing Hereticks, he fought against God. After some conversation upon this subject, the King told him at last, he was the Man who was accused of being the protector and chief encourager of the Hereticks, and then gave him the Articles of accusation against him. Cranmer perusing them, fell on his knees, and freely owned to the King, he was still of the same mind he was of when he opposed the six Articles; but that he had done so said nothing against them. Then he humbly desired to be tried by the Laws, because he was sure he should never be convicted of transgressing them. Whereupon the King asked him, "Whether it was true that he was married."

He informs him of the whole Plot, and orders him to proceed against his Accusers.

Cranmer confessed it, but said he had sent his Wife to Germany upon the passing of the Act of the six Articles. Henry, who had long seen about him only such as dissimulated their sentiments, was charmed with the Archbishop's candor and sincerity. Instead of being dissipated with his confession, he could not forbear admiring his stedfastness, which made him dare the greatest danger he had ever been in, and that he so wisely allied it with an inviolable regard for the Laws. Wherefore he gave him a very sensible proof of his esteem and affection, in discovering to him the Plot his enemies had laid against him, naming his accusers, and ordering him to proceed against them. Cranmer excused himself; but the King told him positively he would be obeyed, and that he should name his Judges himself. If Cranmer had been vindictive, he had a fair opportunity of being revenged on those who would have ruined him, and particularly on Casfather chief contriver of the Plot, as appears in Letters under his own hand. But he showed so great backwardness to push this affair, that at length the King was tired with pressing him, since he did it so unwillingly. Mean while, he had not the less value for him. Shortly after, one of his secret enemies, known for such by the King, though he himself had no suspicion of him, desiring his assistance in a suit he had at Court, he went immediately and spoke to the King in his behalf. The King surprized to see him speak for this Person, asked him if he knew him well; and upon his answering, that he took him for his Friend; No, replied the King, he is your mortal enemy, and I command you when you see him next to call him Knave. Cranmer modestly answered, such language did not become a Bishop; but the King insisted upon his compliance. Nevertheless Cranmer found means to be excused, and the King, content with admiring his goodriefs, would not press him any farther. Thus the Plot, contrived for the Archbishop's ruin, served only to inhear him the more to the King, and demonstrate to his enemies how dangerous it was to attack him.

The 23d. of December, the King created the Lord Parr, the Queen's Brother, Earl of Essex (1), and conferred on Sir William Parr her Uncle, the title of Lord Parr [of Horton,] with the Office of Chamberlain to the Queen (2).

Whilst these things passed in England, the War between the Emperor and the King of France was carrying on in several places. In the beginning of the Campaign, Francis had some advantages in the Low-Countries, where he took Landrevy, Emery, Bapaume, Maubeuge and Luxemburg. But the Emperor arriving about the end of the Summer with a strong supply of Spanish Troops, Francis being inferior in number, was obliged to keep at some distance. This gave the Emperor an opportunity to invest Landrevy, of which however he was forced to raise the Siege, upon Francis's finding means to throw in succours. But he made himself amends by taking Cambray.

At the same time Barbarossa, Admiral of the Turks, coming to Marseilles the beginning of July, with a hundred and ten Turkish Gallies, found there the Earl of Enghien, of the House of Bourbon, with twenty-two French Gallies. After their junction, they went together and attacked Nice, the 10th of August, and on the 20th, became masters of the Town. But the Castle made so brave a defence, that the Turkish Admiral finding he lost both time and reputation before the place, retired and wintered in Provence, from whence he returned to Turkey the beginning of the Spring. I shall say nothing of the War in Piedmont, because it produced no remarkable event (3).

During this whole Campaign, Henry assisted the Emperor only with a small Body (4) of Troops, commanded by Sir John Wallop (5). But they both formed vast projects for the next year. They intended to enter France, the one by Champagne, the other by Picardy, each at the head of forty thousand Men, and to join about Paris. To execute this project it was necessary to act with union and a good understanding. So, Henry could not dispense with performing his promise to the Emperor, to give the Princess Mary a place in the Succession. The Parliament meeting the 14th of January 1544, immediately passed an Act, settling the order of those who could pretend to the Crown after the King's death. I have frequently observed, that the Parliament was held in subjection, and did nothing but what the King pleased. Several Instances have been seen, but none more flagrant than the following. In this Act Prince Edward was ranked first, with his issue. In the second place, the Heirs-Male by the King's present or future marriage, with their issue. In the third place, the Princess Mary and her Line. Lastly, the Princess Elizabeth and her Heirs. But there was no mention of the King's divorces with the Queens, Mothers to these two Princesses. So notwithstanding the Acts, which approved and confirmed these divorces, and were never repealed, the Parliament seemed to consider these Princesses as legitimate, though before they had been declared Bastards, and, as such, excluded from the Succession. On the other hand, to convince them, they were indebted to the King their Father for this favor, the Act made them liable to such limitations or conditions, as the King should please to declare by his Letters Patents, on pain of forfeiting the right which was granted them. Moreover, in case of disobedience on their part, or if they died without Heirs, the Parliament gave the King power to settle the Crown on any other by his Letters Patents, or his last Will signed with his own hand. Was not this considering these two Princesses as Bastards, since their right to the Succession was made to depend on the King their Father's pleasure? Without pretending to question the right of the King and Representatives of the Nation to settle the Succession as they please, I cannot forbear remarking, that this right was carried on this occasion as far as it can be stretched. Supposing these two Princesses Bastards, the Parliament impowered the King to call them to the Throne, contrary to the Laws and Customs of the Realm since the Conquest. On the other hand, supposing them legitimate, they left the King free to exclude them from the Succession, contrary to the same Laws and Customs, since it was in his breast to impose on them conditions impossible to be performed. This was a power no King of England had ever enjoyed, and which shows, this Act flowed not so much from the Parliament as from the King himself. To palliate in some measure these contradictions, care was taken not to mention in the Act, the King's divorces with Catherine and Ann. Only every one was free to guess the motives of the Act, which was not very difficult, since there was no other than that of complying with the King's Will. By a clause in this Statute, all persons were obliged to take a new Oath against the Authority of the Bishop of Rome, which whosoever refused, or should break any of the Articles of this Act, was to be adjudged a Traitor.

By another Act passed this same Session, the Title of the King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and Supreme Head of the Church of England and Ireland, was united for ever to the Crown of England.

By another it was enacted, that no person should be indicted on the Statute of the six Articles, but upon a Presentment by the Oaths of twelve Men, before Commissioners appointed by the King: That no person should be imprisoned but upon an Indictment; and lastly, that the Presentment should be made within forty days after the pretended offence was committed, otherwise it should be rejected (1). Hereby the Ecclesiastical Court were tied up in some measure, from oppressing the Subjects on pretence of Heresy, since the same privileges were allowed for that crime, as were enjoyed by the English with respect to all other offences.

Lastly, the Parliament granted the King a Subsidy, in a manner unheard of before, by enjoining that those who lent him money should be obliged to forgive the debt (2). However unjust this Act was with respect to the particular Persons who had lent the money, the Parliament was not sorry, the King desired it, in order to put a stop to the custom of Loans, which in time would have rendered Parliaments useless.

The Power formerly granted the King was also revived (during Life,) of appointing Commissioners to examine all Canons and Constitutions Ecclesiastical, and to make the necessary Alterations, which the King had hitherto neglected (3).

Before the end of the Session, Thomas Wriesthedy great friend of the old Religion, was made Lord Chancellor in the room of the Lord Audley deceased (4).

In the beginning of the year, Francis I. sent into Piedmont the Earl of Enghein who was but two and twenty years old, to take the command of the Army in the room of Bautier who had not been very successful. This young Prince engaging the Marquis of Guelfe, at Ceryjeux, obtained the 14th of April, a signal Victory over him, which cost the Imperialists ten thousand Men, besides the Wounded and Prisoners. In the confirmation the Marquis of Guelfe was under, after the loss of the Battle, he would have found it very difficult to keep Milan for the Emperor, if the Earl of Enghein had not been stopped in the midst of his career by express orders. As the King of France was inform'd, that the Emperor and the King of England were to join and invade him in the center of his Dominions, with an Army of eighty thousand Foot, and twenty two thousand Horse, he deemed it more necessary to provide for the defence of his Kingdom, than to think of making Conquests in Italy. For this reason he ordered the Earl of Enghein to send him twelve thousand Men of his Army. This diminution disabled the young Prince to reap any other advantage from his Victory than the taking of Carignano, which he reduced to the King's Obedience.

Mean while, the formidable Armies which were to invade France not being yet ready, Henry resolv'd to make use of part of his Troops to finish the Affair of Scotland, which he had ever at heart. Though he had declared War against Scotland, it was not to make conquests upon that Kingdom, but solely to compel the Scots, by the terror of his Arms, to agree to the marriage of their Queen with the Prince his Son. He could not conceive, that in their present circumstances, they could farther themselves with the hopes of success, in a War so unequal and capable of ruining Scotland in one single Campaign. But Cardinal Beaton, an obdurate Man if ever there was one, who governed in the Regent's name, chose rather to expose the Kingdom to become a Prey to the English, than consent to a Peace, which could not be made without ruining his fortune. So Henry seeing it was necessary to press him more closely, resolv'd to send into Scotland part of the Troops design'd against France. The Lord Edward Seymour Earl of Hertford, and Sir John Dudley Lord Lisle High-Admiral, were appointed for this expedition. The former led the Army to Newcastle, where the Admiral arrived with a Fleet, and two hundred transport Ships, on which the Troops embarked. The Earl of Hertford landing near Leith (5), took that Town without difficulty, and then march'd directly to Edinburgh, of which he became master with the same ease. The Regent and Cardinal had not provided for their defence, imagining the King's threats would be without effect. The City of Edinburgh was sack'd and burnt; but the English attack'd not the Castle, for fear of being engag'd in too long a Siege. After that, they returned to Leith, and burning the Town, retir'd to Berwick the 18th of May (6). If

Henry had resolv'd to improve his advantage, he would have sack'd all Scotland, considering the great collection of the Scots upon this invasion. But two reasons prevented him. The first, that he wanted his Troops to send them to France, where he intended also to go in person. The second, that his aim was only to let the Scots see what they were to expect, if they did not speedily resolve to execute the Treaty for their Queen's marriage, and he scarce doubted but this method would succeed. Mean while, it must have been thought very strange, that he should court the young Queen of Scotland for the Prince his Son, in so extraordinary a manner, and the World was of opinion, either he had done too much, or did not do enough.

Tho' Henry had withdrawn his Army out of Scotland, he had not however relinquish'd his project of harassing the Scots till he forc'd them to agree to the marriage. To this end he improv'd an opportunity to give the Regent and the Cardinal fresh disturbances. The Earl of Lennox as I said, having quitted the Court, was retir'd to Dunbarton, the Governor whereof was devoted to him, but found himself greatly embarras'd. His Friends in France had inform'd him, that the King was exceedingly incens'd against him, and accus'd him of having lavish'd away the Money sent him to maintain the War against the English. This was in effect what had been hinted to Francis by the Queen-Dowager, the Regent, and the Cardinal, who were seconded by the Cardinal of Lorraine, and the Duke of Guise, and in this manner the French Historians represent it. The Earl, willing to clear himself, had sent a Man into France, to acquaint the King with all that had pass'd in Scotland since his arrival, and with the present situation of affairs. But the King, prepossess'd by the Cardinal of Lorraine, refus'd to give the Messenger Audience, nay, was going to order him to Prison. The Earl, seeing himself thus forsaken, both by the King of France, and those who had at first join'd him in Scotland, sent to the King of England, to know whether he would take him into his Service, with the Earl of Glencairn his intimate Friend. Henry receiv'd the Overture more favorably than the two Lords durst have expected. He promis'd them his Protection on certain conditions, which he would settle with them, if they would send some trusty person to England. Whereupon the Earl of Glencairn came himself to Carlisle, with the Bishop of Cathness, Brother of the Earl of Lennox, and two others. In a few days after their arrival, they concluded with the King's Commissioners (7) a Treaty, wherein the Earl of Lennox and Glencairn promis'd,

- I. That they would cause the pure word of God to be preach'd in their Territories.
- II. That they should hinder to the utmost of their power, the young Queen from being carried out of Scotland, and do their endeavour to deliver her into the hands of the King of England.
- III. That they would assist the King with all their Forces, to procure him (8) the direction of the Government of Scotland, and the Title of Protector of the Realm.
- IV. That the Bishop of Cathness, and Hugh Cunningham, should be given in Hostage to the King of England.

The King promis'd on his part

1. That his Army should not oppress their Lands.
2. That he would confiscate the Earl of Lennox Regent of the Kingdom, provided he would do nothing without his express consent.
3. That he would give him out of the Revenues of the Crown, what should be reasonable to support the Dignity of Regent.
4. That in case the young Queen should die, he would support the Earl of Lennox in obtaining the Crown against the pretensions of the Earl of Arran.
5. That he would give the Earl of Glencairn an yearly Pension of a thousand Crowns.

(1) Here is a mistake. The Presentment was to be made within a year after the Offence committed. And if any Preacher or Reader should speak any thing in his Sermon or Reading, contrary to any matter contained in the six Articles, he must be complained of within forty days, unless he should have given why it could not be so soon. See the Act. This Act had clearly a relation to the Conspiracies mentioned in the former years, both against the Archbishop, and some of the King's Servants.

(2) Nay, those who had got payment, either in whole or in part, of the Sums so lent the King, were to repay what they had received, to the Exchequer. There was such an Act pass'd in the sixth year of the King's Reign. See above, p. 785, Note (a). Burnet, Tom. I. p. 330.

(3) There were thirty two Commissioners appointed, sixteen of the Clergy, and the same number of the Laity. The Bill for examining the Laws was read, the first time, January 19; and for the second, third, and fourth times, the 19th, 22d, and 24th of the same Month, and pass'd March 6. Upon mention of this Bill's being read the fourth time, it is observ'd in the Journals of the House of Lords, that those of them who have been already so often read four times. See Year's Digest, Burnet, Tom. III. p. 161; and Statute, 25. Hen. 8. In this Session of Parliament, there was a very good Act made for the preservation of Timber and Woods, which ought to be better observ'd. See vol. c. 17.

Herbert.

Some days after, the Earl of Lenox came to the Court of England, where the foregoing Treaty was confirmed the 26th of June; with the following additional Articles :

That the Earl of Lenox should surrender to the King the Castle of Dunbritton, and the Isle of Bute.

That if he married Margaret Douglas, he should assign her an honorable Dowry.

That the King engaged on his part, to aid him with five hundred Men, to give him a Pension of seventeen hundred Marks (1) for himself, and one of a hundred Marks for George Striveling, Governor of Dunbritton.

In consequence of this Treaty the Earl of Lenox came to Dunbritton with thirteen Ships, and about six hundred Men. Upon his arrival, he went to the Castle with a few Followers, to try to persuade the Governor (2) to deliver the Place to the King of England. But the Governor preferring his duty to his affection for the Earl, refused to admit the English. This attempt failing, Lenox ravaged the Isles of Arran and Bute, where he met with no opposition. Then he made a descent upon Kintyre, and after plundering some Villages, sailed to Brighthelm, where he expected the King's return, who was now in France.

In the mean while, the Earl of Arran and Cardinal Beaton, profecuted, with the utmost rigour, the Earl of Lenox's Friends, and confiscated their Estates. But a fresh Invasion of the English, who, though few in number, took Jedburgh, Kelso, and Coldingham, caused them to cease these Proceedings, and raise an Army to enable them to repulse their Enemies. The Scotch Army amounting to eight thousand Men, being ready to march, the Queen-Dowager, the Regent, and the Cardinal, led them to Coldingham, where the English, when they retired, had left a Garrison. But whilst they were employed in this Siege, the Regent having advice, that the English were marched from Berwick to relieve the Town, was seized with such a Panic, that speedily mounting his Horse, he fled all alone to Dunbar. This hasty flight threw the whole Army into such a consternation, that there was no hindering the Soldiers from disbanding. The Earl of Angus alone resolved to stay with a few Men, and carry off the Artillery, which was going to be deserted. The Scots being dispersed, the English ravaged without mercy, Trevis, Merch, and Lauderdale, compelling the Inhabitants to swear Allegiance to the King of England. Buchanan adds, that the Earl of Angus reviving the Regent's Courage, they assembled some Troops, and causing the English to fall into an Ambush, slew eight hundred (3) of their Men, and took a thousand Prisoners. But there is nothing like this in the English Histories.

Whilst the King of England was acting against Scotland, till Things were ready to begin the war in France, the Emperor was at Spire, where he had called a Diet, to try to obtain some assistance from the Princes of Germany. The Protestants at first expulved very much to assist him, whilst he left them exposed to the Insults of their Enemies. But the moment they obtained a Decree, that they should not be disturbed in the exercise of their Religion, they granted whatever was required. This was all they desired, and it was deemed a signal favour to grant it, even with such Limitations and ambiguous Clauses, as would one day render it fruitless. So the Diet broke up about the end of May, to the mutual satisfaction of the States of the Empire. The Pope alone was offended at the Decree, in favour of the Protestants, and to hinder them from long enjoying the Toleration granted, till the Council should meet, he fixed the opening of the Council of Trent to the 25th of March 1545.

Whilst the Emperor was at Spire, he ordered Luxemburg to be invested, which surrendered about the end of May. Then, he headed his Army in Person, to begin the execution of the Projects concerted with Henry. 1544. Since the conclusion of the Treaty in February last year, whereby they were each to bring into the Field but twenty-five thousand Men, they had agreed to encrease Henry the number of their Troops, to invade France with two Armies, which together were to make above a hundred thousand Men, and to join them about Paris.

The Emperor's first Exploits, till the King of England's arrival, were the taking of Commercy and Ligny in le Barrois. After that he entered Champagne, and besieged St. Didier the 8th of July. This place, though weak, held out above six weeks, and then was taken by a false intelligence carried to the Governor.

The War with Scotland having prevented Henry from being ready so soon as he had promised, it was about Whitsuntide before he embarked part of his Army for Calais, under the conduct of the Duke of Norfolk (4). As for himself, he still remained in England with the rest of his Troops till the middle of July (5). When Hail, the Duke of Norfolk was beyond Sea, he joined the Count de Buke, who commanded ten thousand Men of the Emperor's Troops, and they jointly besieged the Town of Montreuil. This was probably with the Emperor's consent, who at the same time laid Siege to St. Didier. He was in hopes that place would detain him but few days, and then he should march to Paris, whilst Henry was advancing to join him. Had this project been executed according to agreement, Paris, and all the Country as far as the Loire, would have been in great danger, since Francis had not above forty thousand Men. But the Emperor was preposterously bent upon the Siege of St. Didier, which stayed him above six Weeks. In the mean time, Henry arriving at Calais (6) with the rest of his Army, found that the Emperor's design was to leave him to march alone to Paris, and keep the King of France employed, whilst he pursued his affairs in Champagne. So, perceiving that instead of marching to the rendezvous, the Emperor was employed in a Siege, he ordered likewise Boulogne to be invested, and came himself to the Siege the 26th of July. By this means their project was frustrated, whilst they separately amused themselves with the taking of Towns. This error proved the safety of France. From thenceforward these two Princes mutually charging one another with non-performance of agreements, had no longer any confidence in each other. And therefore the Emperor, by indirect means, caused a Peace to be offered to Francis, whilst Henry more openly granted a safe-conduct for French Ambassadors to come and treat with him, at a league from his Camp.

Mean while the Emperor, having at last taken St. Didier about the middle of August, sent to Henry to march towards Paris, as was agreed. Henry answered, that since he had given the Emperor time to take St. Didier, it was but reasonable the Emperor should stay till he had taken Boulogne, which could not be long. After the taking of St. Didier, the Emperor advanced to Chateau-Thierry, and filled Paris with terror and confusion. Henry's answer convincing him, it would be very difficult to execute their projects during the rest of the Campaign, he renewed his private Negotiation with Francis, which had been suspended. Shortly after, he concluded with France a separate Peace, signed at Crey the 19th of September, not only without including Henry, but even without acquainting him, for fear of prevention.

Henry was not much surprized at the Emperor's proceedings. He ought not to have expected less from such a friend, who was reconciled to him only in order to do his own business. It is certain, Charles V. no more than Maximilian and Ferdinand, his paternal and maternal Grandfathers, never pretended much to sincerity, nor was integrity his principal virtue. Henry complained of his breach of Faith. But it was easy to alledge sundry reasons, little capable however of balancing the Oath he had taken, to conclude neither Peace nor Truce without the consent of his Ally. But these Oaths are generally so ill kept in most Leagues, that they seem to be considered only as a sort of form, not much to be relied upon. Happily for Henry, Boulogne had capitulated the 14th of September, before the Treaty of Crey was signed (7).

The Emperor thought himself very politic in easing himself of the burden of the War, and leaving Francis and Henry imbroiled. Indeed, it was a great advantage, had 1545. the King of England designed to land a strong Army at Calais, to relieve Boulogne by Land; this is at least what du Bellay imputes to him in his Memoirs. However, the Marshal leaving the Fort unfinished, encamped on Mount Lambert, to be ready to oppose the Succours. But the English appeared not. As for the Landquents sent for by Henry from Germany, they returned home, because they received not on the borders the Money, they were made to expect. Mean while, the French Army continued encamped, without undertaking the Siege either of Guisnes or Boulogne, though Francis had made so great an effort for that purpose.

In the mean time, the Duke of Orleans died at Chateau Montier, to the great grief of the King his Father, who, by his death, saw the Peace with the Emperor very much shaken, since it was properly founded upon that Prince's Life, as will quickly appear.

The French Army being encamped on Mount Lambert, within Cannon-shot of Boulogne, there were Skirmishes every day in the space between the Mount and the Town. In one of these Conflicts, the Duke d'Amale, known afterwards by the name of the Duke of Guise, was wounded with a Lance, which entering at the corner of his Eye, came out behind his Head. This Wound, though deemed mortal by all, was however cured by the great skill of Ambrose Paré, the King's Surgeon, who was even forced to draw out with Pincers, the head of the Lance which remained in the wound. The Scar in the Duke's Face, gained him the surname of Balafré [or Gashed.]

The Season was now so advanced, that the Siege of Boulogne was not practicable. So Francis was forced to be contented, with ordering the Marshal de Biez to ravage Terre d'Oye, belonging to the King of England. But the sudden Rains made the Country so watry, that the Marshal was soon obliged to retire with his Army. Indeed, the Inhabitants were great Sufferers, because the Garrison of Calais, which should have protected them, was unable to resist so numerous Forces. On the other hand, Briffac, afterwards Marshal of France, defeated a Body of two thousand English. These were all the damages Henry sustained during the Campaign, from an Army of above two hundred thousand Men, which had put his Enemy to a prodigious expence. In all likelihood, this expence, and the ill Success of the Campaign, contributed most to the Peace which was soon after concluded.

Besides that France was exhausted, Francis had still another motive to make Peace with England. He was apprehensive of being soon compelled to renew the war with the Emperor. By the Treaty of Crepi, it was agreed, that the Duke of Orleans should marry one of the Daughters, either of the Emperor, or of the King of the Romans, and on account of this Marriage, should have the Duchy of Milan, or the Earldom of Flanders. In consideration of so advantageous a Settlement for the Duke his Son, Francis had resigned above twenty Places, which he held in Piedmont or Montferrat, and relinquished the Interest of his Brother-in-law the King of Navarre. So, the hopes of the advantages this Marriage was to procure, vanishing by the death of his Son, Francis was to find some other way to obtain them, or break a Treaty now become useless. For this reason, being desirous to know the Emperor's Intentions, he sent Admiral Annebaut to Antwerp, to offer him to renew the Treaty of Peace upon other Conditions, since the death of the Duke of Orleans had rendered those of the Treaty of Crepi of no effect. But the Emperor plainly intimated, that by the death of that Prince, he believed himself freed from his Engagement, when he told the Ambassador, he would not attack the King of France, if he was not first attacked. Francis easily judged by this answer, he should infallibly have a war with the Emperor. This, added to the little progress he had made during the last Campaign, made him desirous of a Peace with England. But as he was unwilling to sue for it, he applied to the Princes of the Smalcaldick League, who offered to become Mediators. This Mediation seemed the less precarious, as the Protestants themselves were highly concerned to procure a Peace between the two Kings. They saw themselves upon the brink of being attacked by the Emperor, since he had made Peace with France, and knew moreover, he was negotiating a Truce with the Turks. Nothing therefore could be more for their advantage, than a good understanding between France and England, that 1545. both Kings might be able to protect them. They sent therefore to France, Christopher de Veninger, John Bruns of Nideport, and John Sturm; and to England, Lewis Bambach, and John Sleidan, to perform the Office of Mediators between the two Kings, in the name of the League. These Ambassadors meeting the Plenipotentiaries of France and England, between Arden and Guisnes (1), presently found it was not easy to make Peace. Francis insisted, that Henry should restore Boulogne, and Scotland be included in the Peace. But Henry absolutely rejected both these Articles. Whereupon a Truce only was negotiated, but with no better Success, because Henry would never and of a agree, that the Scots should be comprised in the Treaty. This appears in the primitive Instructions sent to Sir William Paget one of the English Ambassadors (2), and inserted in the Collection of the Publick Acts. We find also in his Instructions, that Sir William Paget attempted to bribe Bruno, one of the German Mediators, with the offer of a considerable Pension, and in all appearance, the Mediator hearkened to his proposals. Mean while, to obtain the better Terms, Henry feigned a desire to be reconciled with the Emperor, and even sent in Embassy to him, the Bishops of Winchester and Westminster. But this was only to give a Jealousy to Francis.

Cranmer took the advantage of Gardiner's absence to advance the Reformation, which he knew that Prelate would oppose with all his power. Some vacant Bishops-ricks were, by his means, given to persons who favoured the Reformation, and he had thereby among the Bishops a much stronger Party than ever (3). Nay, he found means afterwards to obtain the King's consent to some alterations advantageous to Religion. But Gardiner, who joined in a League against the Protestants of Germany, the least Innovation in England, with respect to Religion, would be apt to induce them to give the King of France all the Satisfaction he could desire, to engage him in their League, in order to act all together against him. This caused Cranmer to find more difficulty than he expected.

In August this year Cranmer lost a good support by the death of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, who had always continued in the height of favour (4). He was Cranmer's Friend, and would have willingly agreed to a farther Reformation. But he was too much a Courtier, to attempt directly to oppose the King's Will. However, as Henry was not always in the same disposition, with regard to Religion, this Lord did the Reformed good Service, when he saw the King in a favourable Situation.

The war with Scotland was faintly continued on both Sides. Henry's design was only to terrify the Scots, and induce them to execute the Treaty concerning their Queen's Marriage. On the other hand, the Scots had no thoughts of invading England. Nevertheless, Francis, who, as was observed, had formed vast Projects against England, sent thither the Regent an Ambassador, called la Brosse, to assure him of his Protection, and a powerful Aid, which was instantly to depart. Besides that a Diversion in Scotland could not but be advantageous to him, he was also excited by the Lorrain Princes, who were desirous to support the Queen their Sister. So, causing the Seigneur de Lorge, Count of Mongomeri, to embark with five thousand Men, he ordered him to use his utmost endeavours to persuade the Scots to make a powerful Diversion on the Frontiers of England. Mongomeri arriving in Scotland the second of July, joined his Troops with the Scots, and both making together fifteen thousand Men, advanced towards the Tweed. For some days several Parties passed the River, and did some damage to the English. But the French General could never persuade the Scots to venture with the whole Army beyond the Tweed. On the contrary, upon news that the Earl of Hall, Hertford was advancing at the head of twelve thousand Men, they hastily retired, and presently after disbanded as usual. This is all that passed in Scotland worth notice, during the Campaign of 1545.

The Parliament of England meeting the twenty third of November, the Convocation continued for two years the Subsidy given the King for Six (5). At the same time, the Parliament suppressed by an Act, all the Colleges, and Hospitals, and gave their Lands to the King. The motive, or rather pretence of this Suppression was, the 1545. abuse of these Foundations. The Parliament designed it also towards the expence of the King's wars with France and Scotland. But this not sufficing, the Commons granted him moreover a large Sum (1), and as they were informed only for that purpose, they were dismissed the 24th of December. Before the session ended, the King made a fine speech, saying, among other things, that never had Prince a greater affection for his People, or was more beloved than himself. He added many such expressions, which, though very far, for the most part, from the truth, were however received by the people with loud Acclamations (2).

During this year, the German Protestants began to feel the effects of the Emperor's late Peace with France, and of the Truce he was just going to conclude with the Turk. Hitherto they had been used somewhat gently. But the Emperor coming to Worms, where the Diet of the Empire was held, plainly declared to them, he could not any way dispense with their submitting to the Council, which was to meet at Trent. This convinced them, there was in reality a design to reduce them by force, and the more, as a certain rumour was spread of a league between the Pope and Emperor, which could not but be agitated. Their Suspensions were farther confirmed, by a Sermon preached by a certain Franciscan, before the Emperor, to whom he represented in very strong terms, that he could not discharge the duty of a good Emperor, unless he laboured to the utmost of his power to extirpate the Lutherans. They knew also, the Emperor had writ to the King of Poland to excite him against them. Moreover, he summoned the Archbishop of Cologne to appear before him within thirty days, because he had embraced the Reformation, and tried to introduce it into his Diocese. All this shewed plainly what they were to expect. Nevertheless, as the Emperor had not yet concluded the Truce with the Turk, and as things were not quite ready, he ordered that a new Diet should be held at Ratisbon the following January. But the better to amuse the Protestants, he decreed, that the Divines of both Parties should come to Ratisbon, a month before the Diet, and hold a free Conference, that something might be afterwards settled in matters of Religion. The Roman Catholics did not like this Conference, and the Protestants were still less pleased with it, because they foresaw that the stiffness of the Divines of both sides, on the Points which would be the subject of their Conference, would give the Emperor and the Diet a pretence to refer the decision to the Council of Trent. The Diet breaking up the 18th of August, the Emperor returned to the Low-Countries. Some time after, he received advice, that the Truce with the Turk was concluded. He thereby saw himself at full liberty to make war upon the Protestants, and under that pretence to set about the execution of his Project to become master of the Empire.

It was properly at the instance of the Protestants only, that the Council was to meet: But it was very far from being such a Council as they had required. They expected it to be held in Germany, in an unsuspected Place, and it was convened at Trent, a City belonging to the King of the Romans, whom they justly considered as their Enemy. Their design was to combat the Papal Authority, and it was the Pope who was to preface by his Legates. They intended to shew, that the Romish Clergy had corrupted Religion, both in Doctrine and Discipline, and it was the Romish Clergy who were to assist as Judges. Nay, it was uncertain whether they should be allowed to produce their reasons. Mean while, it was pretended, that out of great condescension, a Council was called for their sakes, and at their Solicitation. It is therefore no wonder, they should refuse to submit to such a Council, which they as much feared, as they desired one free and impartial. So the Emperor and the Protestants acted directly contrary to their first Proceedings. The Protestants rejected a Council, after defining it with great earnestness, and the Emperor, after amusing them many years on that account, pressed, with all his power, the meeting of the Council of Trent, the Authority whereof he intended to make use of to oppress them. The Pope would have been glad to have had no Council at all, but finding he was too far engaged with the Emperor to recede, had fixed the opening to the 15th of March. After that, he put it off, because on that day there were too few Bishops at Trent. But he had a much stronger reason. He was very glad to wait the issue of the Diet of Worms, in hopes that vigorous resolutions would be taken there against the Protestants, which would engage both Parties in an open War, and furnish him with a pretence, either to delay the opening of the Council, or to remove it to some Town in Italy. But the Emperor, who had now formed his Plan, of making use of the Council's Authority to proceed against the Protestants, caused the Pope at last to order it to be opened at Trent the 15th of December. That day the Legates (meeting in the Cathedral) declared, the Council was assembled for three Causes, to destroy Heresy, to reform Discipline, and to settle a lasting Peace between Christian Princes. This first Session was properly held only for the opening of the Council. There were so few Prelates at Trent, that it would have been ridiculous for so small a number of Persons to pretend to make Decrees upon the Articles for which the Council was called.

The Protestants seeing a Council opened quite different from what they had required, easily perceived no good was to be expected from it. They had the more reason to fear it, as the Kings of France and England being at War with each other, there was no hopes of assistance from them. Mean while, though the German mediators had not succeeded in their Negotiation, the Peace between France and England was not more remote. The reason was, both Kings were equally concerned to end a War, which only did them damage, without a possibility for either to expect any considerable advantage. The War continued however during the Winter of the year 1546. The Earl of Surrey, Son of the Duke of Norfolk, who commanded at Boulogne, having intelligence that the French were conducting a Convoy to the Port of Ostrevent, sallied out (3) with part of the Garrison to intercept it. But he succeeded so ill, that instead of taking the Convoy, he was himself defeated, and forced to retreat in great disorder. This news extremely troubled the King, who was not wont to receive the like. Whether he thought it owing to the Earl's imprudence, or suspected him of some hidden design, he recalled him immediately, and sent the Lord Gray to command in his room. A few days after, he ordered the Earl of Hertford to depart with about ten thousand Men, for fear the French should seize some Post, and cut off the communication between Boulogne and Calais. And indeed that was their design. But the Earl of Hertford, preventing them by two days only, posted himself at Ambleville, where he ran up two Forts which secured the communication. The French having missed their aim, encamped on Mount Lambert; and as the two Armies were not far from each other, there were skirmishes every day, but which decided nothing. It was equally the interest of both Kings to run no hazard, for fear of breaking off the Negotiation of the Peace, which was treating between Ardres and Guisnes.

Francis wished for a Peace, because his Exchequer was drained by his great and continual expence from the beginning of his Reign, and particularly by the naval Armament of the former Campaign. Besides, as he was just entering into a War with the Emperor, he wanted such a friend as the King of England. In fine, he perceived, that after his fruitless efforts to retake Boulogne, it would be very difficult to recover that place by force. Henry was no less desirous of Peace for several reasons. He was grown so fat and corpulent, that it was a trouble for him to move. Nay, he had occasion for an engine with pulleys to lift him up and down stairs. This made him extremely uneasy, and gave him a distaste for business, so that he attended to affairs with some reluctance. In the next place he had no farther thoughts of making Conquests in Picardy. His sole aim was, to procure what was due to him before Boulogne should be recovered, which was of little use to him, since Calais could serve all his purposes. But he had still a more urgent motive to renew his old friendship with Francis. He saw the Emperor, with the Pope's assistance, upon the point of making War on the Protestants, and much questioned their ability to withstand him. In this belief, he was afraid the Emperor, after subduing Germany, would turn his Arms against England, with all the Forces of the Empire, Spain, Italy, and the Low-Countries. He could use the pretence of executing the Pope's Sentence, and even cause a like Sentence to be passed by the Council of Trent. It was therefore not at all advantageous to Henry to be in War with France. It was rather his interest to have Francis's Friendship, as it was also very advantageous to Francis to be secure of Henry's assistance, in case the Emperor turned his Arms against France.

1546. The obstacles to the conclusion of this Peace, consisted in Henry's demand of what was due to him, and in Francis's want of Money to content him. Besides, Francis insisted upon Boulogne, and upon Scotland's being included in the Treaty. These difficulties would have been sufficient to hinder the conclusion of the Peace, if more urgent motives had not induced the two Kings to seek expedients to surmount them. Henry consented at last to the Article concerning Scotland, and as to the rest, a way was found to satisfy both. Henry was to keep Boulogne till he was paid, and Francis promised to discharge the debt in eight years. Every thing being thus settled, the Peace was signed the 7th of June (1). The Treaty ran:

Treaty of Peace between France and England. Act. Pub. XV. p. 95. June 7. Hall. Stow. Herbert. p. 253.

That the King of France shall pay regularly the Pension, due by the Treaty of More of the 30th of August 1525, confirmed by several subsequent Treaties. As also the pension of Salt contained in a Treaty of the 25th of April 1527, valued afterwards at ten thousand Crowns a year. But as Henry pretends the said pension given in lieu of the Salt, is to be perpetual, and as Francis maintains, on the contrary, that it is to cease at Henry's death, it is agreed, that the dispute shall be amicably decided by Umpires; and if the pension shall be found to be perpetual, Francis shall pay it to Henry and his Successors for ever.

Moreover Francis shall pay to the King of England, on the Feast of St. Michael 1554, or within a fortnight after, the Sum of two millions of Crowns de Soleil, as well for the arrears of the pension of the ten thousand Crowns, as for Henry's expence in the Siege of Boulogne, undertaken solely to procure his Money, and in keeping and maintaining that place.

As to the Article of the five hundred thousand Crowns, which Henry presented to Francis on condition he punctually observed the Treaties, as the two Kings differ in point of fact, it is agreed, the dispute shall be decided by Commissioners appointed on both sides within such a time, or by four impartial Lawyers, in case the Commissioners end not the affair.

It is further agreed, that the King of England shall keep Boulogne with its Territories, the Limits whereof are settled by the Treaty, till he receive whatever is due to him.

That when all the Sums shall be paid, Boulogne shall be restored to the King of France, and nothing, that is fastened to the ground, shall be impaired or carried away.

That from the date hereof, to the surrender of Boulogne, neither of the two Princes shall raise any Fort or new Fortification within the territory of Boulogne, but those already begun may be finished.

The Emperor was included by both Parties in the Peace. As for Scotland, Henry agreed, it should be included, on condition the Scots gave him no fresh cause to make War upon them; and in case they did, they were to be deemed included, no otherwise than according to the Treaty of the 5th of April 1515.

Henry's advantages in this Treaty.

Henry could hardly expect greater advantages than those he received from this Peace, which seemed to secure him not only the payment of what was due to him, but also the yearly and perpetual pension of a hundred thousand Crowns. But the most solemn Treaties are not always sufficient security for the performance of what Sovereigns promise. It will appear in the following Reigns, that Francis's Successor not only broke this Treaty with respect to Boulogne, and the Sums for which his Father was bound, but that even the pension was never charged in the Treaties he made with England.

The Peace proclaimed at London. Hall. Stow. Henry calls it in the Chronicle. Peto. Stow.

The Peace was very solemnly proclaimed at London the 13th of June, with a general Procession, wherein were carried all the richest silver Crosses, and the finest Copes worn, for the greater pomp. But this was the last time these things appeared in publick. Shortly after, Henry called them in, together with the Church-Plate, into his Treasury and Wardrobe, without giving any other reason than his will and pleasure.

See yet of the last War. Herbert. p. 256.

It is said, the late War with France cost Henry five hundred eighty six thousand seven hundred and eighteen Pounds Sterling, and the Charges of keeping Boulogne eight years amounted to seven hundred fifty five thousand eight hundred thirty three Pounds. So large a Sum, which was not to be repaid under eight years, had consumed whatever had been granted by the Parliament, and retrieved from the Chapels, Colleges and Hospitals. So that he was forced in the beginning of the year to lay a Tax upon his Subjects, under the name of Benevolence (2), as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

The Peace restored between the two Kings the good understanding which had been interrupted some years, rather by the artifices of the Emperor and his Party in England, than for any just cause. Catherine de Medici, Dauphiness of France, being, at this time, delivered of a Princess, and Henry desiring to stand Godfather (3), he called her Elizabeth. Presently after, the two Kings sent Ambassadors to each other, to receive the Oaths concerning the Peace, and chose for these Embassies their two High-Admirals (4). It is said, that whilst Admiral Annebaut was at London, he began a Negotiation about Religion, and that the two Kings intended to abolish the Mass in their Dominions (5). As for Henry, very likely, if he had lived, he would have advanced the Reformation: Nay, it is certain, that on account of this Negotiation, he ordered Granmer to set down in writing how such a Change might be effected, and to strengthen all with arguments and passages from the Scriptures. But this Project soon vanished into smoke. Probably, Francis had entered into this Negotiation, only because he desired to be in strict union with Henry, and knew by experience, that the bare Proposal of conforming himself to his Sentiments in point of Religion, was a most effectual way to succeed. But it is not likely he really intended to admit of any Reformation in his Kingdom. And indeed, at this very time he was kindling the flames of Persecution all over France against the Reformed, of whom fourteen this year were burnt at Meaux, and many others at Paris, and in other places; not to mention the massacre of Cabriets and Meurindol, for which none were punished. The Cardinals of Lorraine and Tournon his chief Ministers, were too much incensed against the Protestants, for any Man to believe, that so long as they were in favor, the King ever seriously thought of abolishing the Mass in France.

Before the Peace between England and France was signed, the Protestant Princes of Germany seeing themselves going to be attacked by the Emperor, who had at last taken off the mask, since his Peace with France, and Truce with the Turks, sent to Henry, Prince Philip, Brother (6) to the Elector Palatine, to desire assistance. It appears in the King's Letter to this Prince, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Henry had sent to desire him to come, and the Lord Herbert assures, that Philip aimed at marrying the Princess Mary. However this be, the King answered his demand of aid by five Propositions, containing the terms on which he was willing to enter into a defensive League with the Protestants. But as his Propositions tended only to render him head and sole director of the League, they did not think proper to put themselves blindly into his hands. They only told him, if he would deposit somewhere in Germany a hundred thousand Crowns to serve for the defence of the League, they would prefer his alliance to that of Francis. But finding they offered no advantage for himself, he had no such zeal for the Augsburg Confession, (from which he was yet very remote) as to engage in its protection without reaping any benefit. The truth is, the Protestants were persuaded, he had no desire to be really united with them, but intended only to encourage them, for fear they should submit to the Emperor, as also to hinder them from putting themselves under the French King's protection, with whom he had not yet Peace. For the same reason it was, that under colour of continuing the Negotiation, he kept the Count Palatine at his Court, till he saw the Peace with France was near a conclusion.

It was now some time since the Pope and Emperor League had formed the project of a League against the Protestants of Germany. They had agreed upon all the Articles; but the Emperor had thought proper to defer the signing, till that he might say he did it merely in his own defence. At last, about the middle of June, he sent the Cardinal of Trent to Rome, where the League was signed the 26th of the same month. The Pope promised to fund for six months twelve thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and two hundred thousand Crowns, for the War in Germany. Moreover, he gave the Emperor a moiety of one

The German War.

The Emperor having notice that the Pope's Troops were beginning to march; that the Count de Brie had furnished his levies in the Low Countries; and Duke Maurice of Saxony, whom he had engaged in his Party, was ready to act when there should be occasion, assembled his Army about Ratisbon. His design was to meet the Pope's Troops, who were crossing Tirol, under the conduct of Ottaviano Farnese. At the same time to hinder this junction, the elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse marched the same way, with an Army of forty thousand Men. Without entering into the particulars of this first Campaign, I shall only say in general, that the Protestants, though superior in number, could not hinder the junction of the Italian Troops, nor of those of the Low Countries, with the Emperor. The different tempers of the elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse did not a little contribute towards their taking wrong measures. In short, the Campaign lasting till November, elector of Saxony received the ill news, that the King of the Romans and Duke Maurice were destroying his Country with fire and sword. This obliging him to march with part of the Army, to the relief of his Subjects, likewise to retire into his Dominions. Thus the Emperor meeting with no more opposition, took Francfort, Ulm, and several other Towns belonging to the League, which furnished him with the Money he wanted for the maintenance of his Army.

Continuation of the Council of Trent. I. Paul. Herbert.

Whilst the War was carrying on in Germany, the Council languished at Trent, and proceeded very slowly. Besides that the Members were very few, they were wholly dependent on the Legates, who durst not themselves undertake any thing without orders from Rome. But it was the Pope's interest to prolong matters, because he hoped, time would procure him at last some occasion to dissolve the Council, or remove it to Italy. Thus the Council was but an empty name, made use of by the Pope and Emperor for their own private views, and to cast a mist before the eyes of the publick.

Persecution in Scotland. Buchanan. Burnet.

Religion began also to cause troubles in Scotland, or at least to produce the seeds thereof, by the despair to which those that embraced the Reformation were driven. Since Cardinal Beaton and the Earl of Arran had enjoyed the Peace procured them by the King of France, they thought only of being revenged on their enemies. Religion furnished them with a pretence, because the opposite Faction almost wholly consisted of the Reformed. In the course of this year 1546, they put to death several Persons for Religion at Perth, St. Andrews, and other places (1). The Regent suffered himself to be so led by the Cardinal, that he gloried in delivering to the Flames those whom he had formerly considered as his Brethren. Among those who were sacrificed to the furious passion of the Cardinal, a Minister called Sephard (2), who suffered Martyrdom at St. Andrews, was particularly remarkable. This Man being condemned to the Fire, the Regent at the instance of one of his Friends would have saved his Life, and to that end sent a note to the Cardinal, desiring him to suspend the execution. But the barbarous Prelate, without regarding the Regent's request, not only caused the Sentence to be executed, but would also feed his eyes with the sad Spectacle, sitting in state in a great Window of his Castle. It is said, that, before he was delivered to the Flames, the Minister told the Executioner, "That within few days the Prelate who beheld him with such pride from yonder high place, should lie in the same as ignominiously as now he was seen proudly to rest himself." This prediction proved but too true for the Cardinal. Presently after he was murdered in his own Palace, and his Body thrown into the Street, out of the very Window from whence he looked on, while Sephard was burning.

As for England, Religion was still upon the same state, as the King had been pleased to establish it. The Reformation had made some progress; but was far from being brought to perfection, and yet the Reformed could not forbear hoping, the King himself would carry it much farther. In this belief, they thought it prudent not to provoke him, and that they effectually considered the welfare of their Religion, by remaining in silence, and waiting for better times. This is the true reason why there were fewer Persons that faltered for Religion in England than in France. It is not to be questioned, that if there had not been hopes of a further Reformation, many People would have openly declared the opinions, which these hopes induced them to conceal. For much the same reason, those who retained all the Tenets of the old Religion, durst not directly oppose the King, for fear their opposition should carry him beyond the bounds he seemed to have prescribed to himself. From hence sprung a blind and universal compliance with the King's Will, and the excessive Power he had acquired over all his Subjects, of which he made a very ill use. He had been troubled for some time with an old sore in his Leg, which was grown very painful. This, added to his monstrous Corruption, which rendered him almost unable to stir, made him froward and untractable, that none approached him without trembling. He had been always fit and vigorous, but was incomparably more so towards the end of his days, than in the beginning. Flattery had corrupted his Judgment and Sense, that he deemed it an unpardonable Crime, to contradict his Opinions, though he changed them himself very frequently. I have observed, that he treated with Admiral Woodhouse of abolishing the Mass, and changing it into a Communion, after the manner of the Protestants. And yet, shortly after, Shaxton, who had resigned the Bishoprick of Exeter, to the six Articles, being accused of denying the real Presence in the Sacrament (3), the King was pleased to have him tried according to the rigor of the Law, and he was condemned to be burnt. But this Man, who had endured the hardships of a long Imprisonment, could not beild with the same firmness the Punishment prepared for him. The King having sent the Bishops of London and Worcester, to persuade him to recant, he was prevailed upon, and avowing his pretended Heresy, the King granted him his pardon. He became afterward a cruel persecutor of the Reformed.

This example was not capable of moving Ann A. Key, who was accused of the same Crime, and rigorously prosecuted, though she had good Friends at Court, where she was well known (4). She firmly persisted, notwithstanding all the Promises to save her Life, in case she would recant (5). Some Court Ladies, touched with compassion for her, having sent her some Money, when in prison, for her subsistence, were the occasion of her being more cruelly tormented (6). Chancellor Wriothesley, a great Enemy to the Earl of Hertford, hoping to draw something out of the Prisoner against that Lord or his Countess, caused her to be racked. Nay, 'tis said, he Fox would be present himself, and observing the Executioner was moved with pity to the Prisoner, threw off his Gown, and taking upon him the honorable Office, drew the Rack so severely, that he almost tore her asunder. But this is a fact that scarce seems credible. However, the Woman's Bones being put out of joint, she was carried in a Chair to the place of execution, and burnt, with four Men condemned for the same Crime (7). But Hall, Sermon preached by Shaxton they were made to hear a sermon which was with obsequy in very bitter and abusive Terms. All this was not capable of shaking their Constancy, which induced to their last breath.

The Enemies of the Reformation seeing the King incensed against the Sacramentarians, thought it a favorable opportunity to ruin the Queen and the Archbishop of Canterbury, whom they considered as the grand Protectors of the Reformed. Among the supporters of the old Religion, the chief were, Chancellor Wriothesley, the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Surrey his Son, Banner Bishop of London, Gardiner Bishop of Winchester; and these had doublets, among the Courtiers, and the King's Servants, Creatures who failed not to be servicable on occasion. But whatever Project they formed, the Archbishop of Canterbury was still in their way, who having great Influence over the King, commonly broke their measures. So to be entirely freed from this formidable Adversary, they resolved to complain of him openly to the King, and accuse him of being the Head and Protector of the Sacramentarians, and of all in general who rejected the six Articles. This resolution was executed.

The Person who took upon him to speak to the King, told him, there were evident Proofs ready of what was alleged against Cranmer, and if he were sent to the Tower, so many Witnesses would appear against him, that the King would be himself surprized. Henry was not ignorant that Cranmer was against the Six Articles in his mind, since he had himself frankly owned it. But he really loved him, and therefore would not expose him to a Trial which must have been fatal to him. Besides, he took it very ill, that such pains were taken to destroy a Man, for whom he had so often and so openly declared. However, resolving to see how far the Malice of his Enemies would go, he consented that he should be the next day called before the Council, and sent to the Tower, if they saw Cause. But in the night the King lent for Cranmer, and telling him what had been resolved, desired to know how he meant to answer for himself. Cranmer thanked the King, and prayed him, that since he was to be questioned for his religious Opinions, Judges might be assigned him who understood those matters. The King replied, he went the wrong way to save his Life, for most certainly his Enemies had Witnesses ready to convict him in such manner, that the Judges would be forced to condemn him; and therefore since he took so little care of himself, he would look to it. So he ordered him to desire the Council, to use him as a Privy-Councillor, and as they would expect to be used in the like case, that is, that his Accusers might be brought face to face before he was sent to the Tower; and if his request was not granted, he was to appeal to the King. At the same time he pulled off his Ring, and giving it to him, said, if his Appeal was rejected, he should show the Council that token of his Protection. Next Morning Cranmer coming to the Council-door, was so long kept waiting in the Lobby, that the King hearing of this disrespect, sent word, that he should be presently brought in (1). It happened as the King foresaw, so that Cranmer was forced at last to produce the King's Ring, which terribly mortified his Enemies. Then they all rose up, and went and informed the King of what had passed, who told them, he thought he had a wiser Council than now he found they were, and laying his hand on his Breast, swore, that he took the Archbishop to be the most faithful Subject he had. The Duke of Norfolk willing to excuse the Council, said, They meant the Archbishop no harm, but only to vindicate his Innocence by such a Trial as would have freed him from all Aspersions. But the King looking sternly at him, answered, "He would not suffer Men who were so dear to him, to be thus handled with Impunity. He knew the Factions that were among them, and their Malice to one another, which he would either extinguish, or very speedily punish." Then he commanded them all to be reconciled to the Archbishop. They immediately obeyed, though it was but in outward appearance. But for Cranmer, he heartily forgave them, as he plainly showed afterwards.

It seems, so great a mortification should have made these Men more cautious. But their extreme desire to succeed in their Plots, would not suffer them to desist, with regard to the Queen. They perceived, if the King had opposed their accusation of Cranmer, it was not to hinder the execution of the Law of the six Articles, but from a pure motive of affection for that Prelate. That therefore their Proceedings could not have displeased him as to the Thing, but only in respect of the Person. This made them think they should find it easier to destroy the Queen, because the King would never willingly suffer that his own Wife should differ from him in matters of Religion. Catherine Parr, who was then on the Throne, had gained the King's Affection by her extraordinary care of him, and by giving him daily fresh marks of her Gratitude. She was a reformer in her heart, and even sometimes took the liberty to have Sermons preached in her Privy-Chamber, before some of her Ladies. It came to the King's ears, but he took no notice of it. Nay, he suffered her to dispute with him upon Religion, imagining she did it only for Instruction. But at last these Disputes having been carried too far, he expressed his displeasure at them, and even began to look more coldly upon the Queen, than formerly. This made her Enemies fancy it a fair opportunity to work her ruin, whilst ignorant of their designs, she was seeking occasions to inspire the King with favorable thoughts of the Reformation.

The King first vented to Gardiner his displeasure with Burnet the Queen. He could not pitch upon a more partial Man. Gardiner failed not to cherish the King's resentment, by aggravating the Queen's obstinacy, and his Pains to inflame her notions into the Ladies who served her. The Chancellor, who was also let into the Secret, confirmed what Gardiner had said, and hinted to the King, that the Queen had encouraged Ann Askew in her obstinacy, and even insinuated, that she was plotting against the State. In short, they went so far, that Articles were drawn against her, and signed by the King. The Chancellor putting up the Paper carefully in his Pocket, it dropped from him, and the Person that found it carried it to the Queen, who seeing the King's hand to such a Paper, concluded herself lost. However, being advised by some of her Friends, to go to the King and try to appease him, she came into his Room with a settled Countenance, as if she knew nothing of what had passed. The King received her very kindly, and began to talk of Religion. She answered, these things were above her, and the ought to learn of him, what she was to believe. Not so, by St. Mary, said the King, you are become a Doctor, and able to instruct us. The Queen feigning to be surprized at his manner of speaking to her, answered very mildly, "She saw with grief he was offended at the freedom she had sometimes taken to dispute with him in matters of Religion, but she had done it innocently, with the sole view of diverting him, knowing what Pleasure he took in talking of those things, which none understood better than himself; her chief aim had been, not only to make him forget his pain, by such sort of Discourses, but also to receive Instruction herself, and indeed she had profited much; and if she had started objections, it was only to give him occasion to clear the difficulties, which were above a Woman's understanding." And is it even so, said the King, then you are Friends again. So he embraced her with great Affection, and sent her away with very tender assurances of his constant Love to her (2). On the morrow, which was the day appointed for carrying the Queen to the Tower, the King going to take the Air in the Garden, sent for her, and presently after came in the Chancellor, with forty of the Guard. But the King steps aside to him, and after a little Discourse, was heard to call him in an angry tone, Knave, Fool, and Beast. Then he came again to the Queen, who seeing him in a Passion with the Chancellor, endeavoured to appease him. But the King told her, she had no reason to plead for him.

These two attempts against the Archbishop and the Queen, not only proved unsuccessful, but also very prejudicial to the Enemies of the Reformation. From thenceforward the King could not endure them, being satisfied their chief aim was to overthrow whatever he had established. Gardiner was turned out of favour immediately, and the King would not suffer him to be present in the Council (3).

But a greater storm fell on the Duke of Norfolk, and his Son the Earl of Surrey. Henry almost choked with jealousy to pursue the Duke of Norfolk, and perceiving his Leg visibly to grow worse, plainly saw he had not long to live. In this belief, he considered the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Surrey, as two Lords who could greatly imbroil the Prince his Son, during his Minority. The Duke of Norfolk was as it were, the Head of the favourers of the Pope, and the old Religion, though, like a good Courtier, he had outwardly complied with all the King's Innovations. Henry was contented with this external compliance, though he knew he was ever attached to the Pope, whose Party was still very powerful in England, and that his Son the Earl of Surrey was in the same Sentiments. This sufficed to inspire him with a just fear, that after his death, these two Lords, assisted by the Pope, the Emperor, and their

2. Whether the King had really designed her Ruin or not, is differently represented by the Writers who lived next that time. Some, says the Earl of Herbert, believe it was not so much the King's Intention to use the rigour of the Law, as to deter her from reading forbidden Books, p. 285.

3. Lord Herbert says, though it appears by Gardiner's submission, contained in our Records, that not long after he fell into the King's displeasure, yet Cranmer on this occasion, or that he was a special Friend to the Duke of Norfolk, (who was now all in disgrace) or any other Cause, is not there to be found. However, the King excluded him out of the Number of those whom he appointed his Executors, and Counsellors to his Son Edward VI. Herbert, p. 285.

1546. II. The Children he might have by his present Queen, or any other whom he should marry after her.

III. The Princess Mary and her Issue, provided she married with the assent and consent of the Executors of his last Will and Testament, or of the major part of those who should then be alive, given under their Hands and Seals. This consent of the Executors, was a condition so annexed to the Right he granted Mary to succeed in her turn, that without it, his intent was, she should entirely forfeit her Title to the Crown.

IV. The Princess Elizabeth upon the same condition with Mary.

V. Frances Brandon eldest Daughter of his Sister Mary and the Duke of Suffolk.

VI. Eleanor Brandon, Frances's younger Sister.

If all these Persons should happen to die without Heirs, or their Issue come to fail, it was the King's Will, that the Crown should go to the next rightful Heirs. By that he could mean only Mary the young Queen of Scotland, Grand-daughter of his eldest Sister Margaret, who ought naturally to have preceded the Children of the King's younger Sister Mary.

Lafly, he added, that in case Mary performed not the condition required of her, the Crown should devolve to Elizabeth, as if Mary had died without Heirs.

In like manner, if Elizabeth neglected to perform the same condition, his intent was, that the Crown should go to Frances Brandon, as if Elizabeth had died without Issue.

Executors. He appointed for Executors of his last Will thirteen Lords, most of whom were Privy Counsellors, as the Archbishop of Canterbury, Chancellor Writchesley, the Earl of Hertford young Edward's Uncle, &c. These thirteen (1) Executors were also nominated for the Prince his Successor's Privy-Council, till he was eighteen years of age. Moreover, he named certain Persons who were to be called to the Council upon extraordinary occasions.

Debt. He ordered his Executors to pay first all his debts, and then to make good all his grants to several particular Persons.

Heir. He made the Prince his Son Heir to all his Goods, Plate, Jewels, Money, Cannons, Ammunition, Ships, with all things belonging thereto, and charged him to be guided by the advice of those who were appointed for his Privy-Counsellors, till he had attained to eighteen years of age.

Legacy. He gave, till their Marriage, to his Daughters Mary and Elizabeth a yearly pension of three thousand pounds Sterling, and to each a portion of ten thousand pounds or more, if the Executors thought proper.

He left his Queen a Legacy of three thousand Pounds, either in Jewels or Plate, as she pleased, and a thousand pounds in ready Money besides her Dowry.

Lafly, he gave five hundred Marks to each of his Executors who were Lords, and to the others three hundred each.

Remark on Henry's Settlement of the Succession. The most extraordinary thing in this Will was the King's passing over in silence the posterity of his eldest Sister Margaret, or at least his placing them after the Line of his youngest Sister Mary. Besides, the clause in his Will, which said that after the posterity of Eleanor Brandon, the Crown should go to the next Heir, must have been favorably explained for this first branch, since these general words were liable to sundry interpretations. This was the effect of the power, the Parliament had given the King, to settle the Succession, or rather to unsettle and put it in a horrible confusion, if Divine Providence had not taken more care of it than he. It is not possible to devise any other reason of his proceedings, than his hatred of the Scots, and his fear that the Kingdom of England would one day fall under the Dominion of a Prince or Princess of that Nation, which however all his precautions could not hinder.

Whilst the King was ordering his Will to be transcribed, the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Surrey's process was forming with great warmth. The King being resolved to dispatch these two Lords, nothing was able to save them. The Son was first brought to his Trial at Guill-Hall (2), before the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Mayor, and other Commissioners, and put upon an Inquest of Commissioners, because he was not a Peer of the Realm, the Duke his Father being alive. Several Witnesses were examined, whose Depositions the Lord Herbert has inserted in his History. But there appears nothing sufficient to convict him of High-Treason, of which he was accused. What was chiefly urged against him was his giving St. Edward's Arms, from whence it was inferred, he aspired to the Throne. However, the King being resolved he should die, he received sentence of death, and was beheaded [on Tower-Hill] the 19th of January (3).

Mean while the Duke of Norfolk used all sorts of means to obtain the King's pardon. He knew him well enough to be sensible, that nothing but an entire submission was capable of appeasing him. To this end, he wrote him a very humble and submissive Letter, declaring he could not call to mind he had ever offended him, and entreated him for God's sake to let him know the cause of his disgrace. He prayed likewise, that his accusers might be brought face to face before his Majesty, or at least his Council, that his cause might be maturely examined. He knew not, he said, that he had offended any Man, otherwise than in appearing very zealous against the Sacramentarians. But therein he had only complied with his Majesty's fenciments and orders. He concluded with conjuring him, to be satisfied with taking all or part of his Lands and Goods as he pleased, leaving him only a subsistence.

This Letter produced a quite contrary effect to what the Duke expected. By clearing himself, he accused the King of injustice, an offence which would not have been easily pardoned, though his destruction had not been resolved. The Duke seeing the King unmoved, signed the 12th of January, before the Lord Chancellor and several other Privy-Counsellors, a Writing wherein he confessed, "That on several occasions he had been guilty of High-Treason, in concealing from the King that his Son the Earl of Surrey bore the Arms of St. Edward the Confessor, which did only belong to the King: "That himself had born in the first quarter of his Arms, ever since his Father's death, the Arms of England, with a difference of the Labels of Silver, which were the proper Arms of the King's eldest Son, and of no other. That he owned this to be High-Treason by the Laws of the Realm; and that he signed this submission without compulsion [or advice,] and threw himself entirely upon the King's mercy."

Very probably the Duke was induced of himself, or by the advice of his friends, to make this confession, in the belief, he should never obtain his pardon, unless he confessed himself guilty, that the King might have room to show mercy. But it was all to no purpose. His ruin was resolved, and the King was not wont to defist from such resolutions when once they were taken. Mean while, as it was easy to see that the Peers, who were the Duke's proper judges, could not condemn him upon the evidences which were to be produced against him, the King thought he should more easily compass his ends by an Act of Attainder. So the Parliament meeting at this time, a Bill of Attainder was brought into the House of Lords, and read three times, on the 18th, 19th, and 20th of January, and passed. In all likelihood the Duke's confession under his own hand, contributed very much to the passing of the Bill. At least it served for an excuse to those who durst not oppose it. The Bill being sent down to the Commons, was read thrice, and sent up also passed on the 24th of January. According to the method, too frequently practised in this Reign, it contained only general accusations, without specifying any thing, except the Duke's bearing the Arms of England, with three Labels of Silver. It was very strange, that his Arms should not have been taken notice of before, which he had born so long in the fight of the King himself, and the whole Court, which he had received from his Ancestors, and for which he had the opinion of the Heralds. The Bill having passed in both Houses, the Lord Chancellor, XV. p. 118. the Earl of Hertford, and some other Lords were commissioned under the Great-Seal to give the Royal assent (4). After that, a Warrant was sent to the Lieutenants

His Sentence was generally esteemed as an act of high injustice and severity, which loaded the Seymours with a popular Odium that they could never overcome. Sir Richard Southwell appealing, that he knew certain things of the Earl, which touched his Fidelity to the King; the Earl vehemently affirmed himself a true Man, and offered to fight in his shirt with 1. Accused. As to his giving the Arms of the Confessor, he said he did it according to the opinion of the King's Herald. His Sister Mary, Duke's sister Richard being examined, confessed that the Earl her Brother should say, These were mine (meaning the Seymours) beard so nobility, and of God called away the King, they should spare for it, with some other passionate words and circumst. that shew, title for his advantage. He was buried at Windsor in the County of Suffolk. Herbert, p. 263, &c. Burnet, Tom. 4. p. 345, &c. Dugdale's Baron. 1547. Part of the Truce, he cut off the Duke's head the 20th of January. But happily for him the King died the night before, and the Council did not think it advisable to begin the new Reign with the execution of one of the greatest Lords of the Kingdom. It is to be observed, that during the proceedings both of the Court and the Parliament against the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Surrey, the Archbishop of Canterbury withdrew to Craydon, without ever appearing at Court. As these two Lords were justly deemed his most mortal enemies, he would not be accused of being concerned in what was transacting against them.

Whilest these Proceedings were forming, the King was seized in his bed with an illness which brought him infelicitously to his end. However, the consideration of the account he was going to render to God, was not capable of moving him to give compassion towards two Lords, of one of the most ancient Families in England, who had done him great Services, and hitherto were guilty of no crime which deserved so severe a punishment. On this occasion, prevailed, as on many others, passion and policy in the King's mind, over justice and mercy. He was bent, at any rate, to sacrifice these two Lords to his Son's safety, and to establish, by their death, all the alterations he had made in Religion, being persuaded they would use their utmost endeavours to destroy them. The sequel plainly showed, he was not mistaken with regard to the Duke of Norfolk who survived him. This Lord's Life, preserved by a sort of Miracle, was a lesson, from how to avoid humane precautions, when contrary to the dictates of God.

The King's illness continually increased, and no Man dared to warn him of his approaching end. Every one was afraid that a Prince who was always approached with trembling, would look upon this due table without being as a crime, and punish accordingly in an Act of Parliament, by which those who should dare to hasten the King's death, were adjudged Traitors. But at last Sir Anthony Denny, one of his Privy-Counsellors, had the courage and charity to warn him that he had but a few hours to live. The King thanked him, and expressed his great grief and horror for all the Sins of his past Life. Whereupon, Denny asked him if any Clergyman should be sent for, and he said, if any, it should be the Archbishop of Canterbury. But Cranmer, being then at Crabden, could not come till the King was speechless. He had but just time to desire him to give him sign of his living in the Faith of Christ. The King quivered his hand, and presently after expired, at the 11th betwixt the 20th and 29th of January 1546-7, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, having reigned thirty seven years and nine months. His death was kept private three days. Probably the Council took time to consult whether the Duke of Norfolk should be executed. At last, after three days, the Lord Chancellor signified to both Houses, that the King was dead and the Parliament thereby dissolved. (1.)

(1) The Reader may see Henry's Character drawn at length by the Lord Herbert. But as his Life and Actions sufficiently rectify him known, I do not only add what Bishop Flower says of him at the End of his History of the History of Henry VIII. (vol. 1. p. 101.) but also among the Great than the Good Princes. He exercised so much Severity on Men of both Parties, that the Winners of both sides have been, as his Cruelty, and taxed his Cruelty. But as neither of them were much obliged to him, so he have taken so much care to let his good Qualities, as his Enemies have done to enlarge on his Vices. I do not deny that he is to be numbered among the ill Princes, yet I cannot rank him with the Worst. King Henry's Body lies buried at Windsor, under a most stately Tomb, begun in Copper and gilt, but not finished. The Reader may see the Model of what it was intended to be, in Symonds, p. 784.

By Indentures of the 14th and 25th of Henry VIII. a Pound weight of Gold of the Old Standard, was to be coined into twenty seven Pounds by Tale; viz. into twenty four Sovereigns, at 22 s. 6 d. a piece, or forty eight Rials at 22 s. 6 d. a piece, or seventy two Angels at 22 s. 6 d. a piece, or eighty one George-Nobles at 8 s. 6 d. a piece, or one hundred and forty four half Angels at 3 s. 9 d. a piece, or one hundred and forty two Forty penny pieces at 1 s. 4 d. a piece; and a pound weight of Gold of the fineness of twenty two Carats only, was to be coined into one hundred Crowns and a half of the double Rose, or two hundred and one half Crowns, making by Tale twenty five Pounds two Shillings and Six-pence; and a pound weight of Silver of the Old Standard, was coined into one hundred and thirty five Groats, or two hundred and twenty half Groats, or five hundred and forty Sterlings, (or Pence), or one thousand and eighty Half-pence, or two thousand one hundred and sixty Farthings, so that every pound weight of Sterling Silver was coined into forty five Shillings by Tale. In the 14th, of this Reign, a pound weight of Gold of twenty three Carats fine, and one Carat Alloy, was coined into twenty eight Pounds sixteen Shillings by Tale; by which measure there were coined Sovereigns at 20 s. 6 d. a piece, Half-Sovereigns at 10 s. 3 d. a piece, and Quarter-Angels at 2 s. 6 d. a piece; and a pound weight of Silver of ten Ounces fine, and two Ounces Alloy, was coined into forty eight Shillings by Tale, namely, into Telfons (which were 22 s. 6 d. a piece) Groats, Half-groats, Pence, Half-pence, and Farthings. In the 20th, of Henry VIII. a pound weight of Gold of twenty two Carats fine, and two Carats Alloy, was coined into thirty Pounds by Tale; viz. into thirty Sovereigns at 20 s. a piece, or sixty Half-Sovereigns at 10 s. a piece, or one hundred and twenty Crown at 5 s. a piece, or two hundred and forty Half-Crowns. And the King had two Carats of fine Gold for Coinage, which yielded him fifty Shillings. Silver was coined by the same Indenture, of six Ounces fine and six Ounces Alloy, into forty eight Shillings by Tale. It was coined into Telfons, Groats, Half-Groats, Pence, Half-pence, and Farthings. In the 27th, of this Reign, a pound weight of Gold of twenty Carats fine, and four Carats Alloy, was coined into thirty Pounds by Tale, as in the last; and the King had four Carats which yielded him five Pounds two Shillings; and a pound weight of Silver, of four Ounces fine, and eight Ounces Alloy was coined into forty eight Shillings by Tale, which raised the pound weight of fine Gold to thirty six Pounds; and the pound weight of fine Silver to seven Pounds four Shillings.

The Gold Coins of Henry VIII. are Sovereigns, Rials, Half-Sovereigns, Angels, George-Nobles, half and quarter Angels, forty-penny Piece, Crown, and half-Crown; And the Silver-Coins, Telfons, Groats, half Groats, Sterlings, Half-pence, Farthings; to which may be added Crown-Piece of Silver, which were first coined by this King. Henry's Sovereign has on one side HENRIC. 8. D. G. AGL. FRANCIE. Z. HIB. REX. the King in his Robes crowned upon his Throne, with the Scepter and Ball. Reverse, the Arms of France and England quarterly, supported by a Lion and a Dragon. IFF. AYTE. TRANSIENS PER MED. ILLO. IBAT. (Fig. 5.) The Angel of this King is like his Father's, a half Angel has this inscription on the Reverse, CRVX. AVE. SPES. VNICA. The Crown and Half-Crown of Gold, have on one side a large Rose and Crown betwixt H. I. crowned, HENRIC. VIII. RYTILANS. ROSA. SIN. SPINA. Reverse, the Arms of France and England quartered under a Crown; and H. I. crowned. DEL. G. R. AGLIE. Z. FRA. DNS. HIBERNIE. (Fig. 6.) As for the Silver-Coinage, there were two sorts of Telfons or Shillings. That of fine Silver exhibits the King half faced, whereof one has CIVITAS EBORACI. The other Shilling, on the broad face Shilling, of a later Alloy, has on one side HENRIC. VIII. DI. GRA. AGL. FRA. Z. HIB. REX. Reverse, POSVI. &c. a Rose crowned, with H. R. likewise crowned. (Fig. 7.) The Groats has his Head with the file face, HENRIC. VIII. DI. GR. AGL. Z. FRANC. Reverse, the Arms of France and England quartered under a Crown; and H. I. crowned. DEL. G. R. AGLIE. Z. FRA. DNS. HIBERNIE. (Fig. 8.) Some coined by Cardinal Wolsey at York, have a Crucifix. Hat under the Arms. H. I. crowned. Half-pence give him seated on a Throne, with (and sometimes without) the Globe and Scepter. H. D. G. RO-A SINE SPIA. (Fig. 9.) The Farthing has on one side a Portcullis (whereby it is distinguished from Half-pence, which it was, not before,) and a Cross and Pellets on the other. (Fig. 4.)

DIRECTIONS concerning the Genealogical Tables.

HISTORY represents to us four things, which are essential to it: 1. The Events: 2. The Place where: 3. The Time when they happened: 4. The Persons who were the Actors. If therefore, in order to understand a History perfectly, it is necessary to have a Knowledge of the Country where the Scene of the Actions lies, by means of Geography, and of the Times wherein they were transacted by Chronology; it is no less requisite to know the Persons concerned, by the help of Genealogies, which very often discover the motives and reasons of Things. Nay, Genealogy has this great advantage above Geography and Chronology, that whereas these last present to the Mind some particular Actions only; the bare Names in a Genealogical Table, form, if I may so say, an Abstract of all the remarkable events in those Persons lives.

Nothing is more easy than to make Genealogies; but it is very hard to draw them up in a clear and distinct manner, and to observe a fix'd and constant method, which represents to the Eye and Mind what one looks after, without the least trouble. This I have endeavour'd to do, by means of the following Rules, which it will be proper to lay before the Reader.

1. The Genealogical Tables are divided by horizontal Lines, marked, 1, 2, 3, 4, &c. On the first Line is placed the Name of the common Stock, whose Posterity is set down on the other Lines. Thus all that are placed on the same horizontal Line, (or between the same Figures) are at an equal distance, or in the same Degree from the common Original. Hence may be seen by the cast of an Eye, the number of Generations from the common Root, and the Degrees of Consanguinity between the Descendants. For instance, in the Table of Woden's Posterity, Woden being the common Stock of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, Hengist, first King of Kent, is placed on Line (6), by which is meant that Hengist is the fifth Descendant from Woden. Afterwards, in the Genealogical Table of the Kings of Kent, Hengist is placed on a Line marked (6), by which means one may immediately see how many degrees any one of Hengist's Descendants were removed from Woden.

England ceasing to be under the Dominion of the Saxons by the Conquest of the Normans, instead of Woden, William the Conqueror is made the common Root of the English Kings down to the present Time. Accordingly, in the Genealogy of William the Conqueror, his name stands upon the Line marked (1.) to denote his being the Stock from whence all the others spring. For instance, Edward III. in this Table, being on Line (9.) in the Table of his own Posterity, he is placed at the same Number, to shew it is only a Continuation of the Genealogy of William the Conqueror.

2. The Sons are always placed according to the Order of their Birth, from the left hand towards the right, by which means the eldest Branches are distinguished from the younger, at one view. The same Order is not observed with regard to the Daughters, who are placed in the void Spaces, so as to prevent the Lines from running out to too great a length. But however, the elder stands always on the left hand of the younger Sister.

3. The Children of the same Prince are placed so, that their Father stands in the Line over them, just in the middle, which saves a great deal of trouble and confusion.

4. As the only end of these Genealogical Tables is to facilitate the reading of this History, several Persons who died young, or unmarried, or without Issue, and the like, are omitted.

5. One of the chief things which render Genealogies plain and useful, is to load them with as few words as possible. By which means the blank Spaces will remain the larger between the names, than which nothing contributes more to make the Tables clear and distinct. This is the reason the following Abbreviations are made use of, as, E. for Earl, D. for Duke, K. for King, Q. for Queen, W. for Wife, d. for died. The Names written in Italian Character, under those that are part of the Genealogy, denote the Husband or Wives. For instance, $\left. \begin{array}{l} \text{Sleda} \\ \text{Ricula of Kent.} \end{array} \right\}$ This signifies that Sleda married Ricula Princess of Kent. When two or more Names are under another, with Numbers before them, this means, 1st. Wife, 2d. Wife, 3d. Wife, or Husband, &c.

6. Lastly, Each King has a Number annex'd, to denote the order of Succession, and in what rank each succeeded to the Crown. This is absolutely necessary in the Succession to the Throne of England, where the order of the Branches was not always observed.
